September's News

» Top Notts Cop Goes Muslim Green

In April this year the Inspector of Constabularies gave a damning report on the record of Nottinghamshire Police, headed up by Chief Constable Steve Green. It said that the force faced an unusually high volume of crime but was too passive in preventing major and organised crime. To show that he was really a man of action, Chief Green has responded by issuing thousands of green "Good Faith" ribbons to his police stations. Officers are urged to wear them to show solidarity with the Muslim community. In his bizarre move he ignored, or was unaware of, the fact that green is the battle colour of Islamic expansionism.

In a comment on Green choosing militant green for his act of brown-nosing, the BNP website news reporter (www.bnp.org.uk) said: "This move is akin to British police officers wearing swastika armbands during the Second World War as a mark of solidarity with the German community of Britain."

» Singapore Courts Set Good Example

A Singapore court has jailed a sole proprietor of a small business for 12 months and fined him $87,000 for hiring and deploying foreign workers illegally. The Manpower Ministry conducted investigations over nine months and found Tan Hong Leok had illegally deployed 29 foreign workers to the conservancy sector, to clean and sweep high density housing compounds, when their work permits only allowed them to work in the marine industry. He also helped another company to deploy seven foreign workers to work as cleaners although their work permits had already been revoked.

The Ministry said it will continue to step up enforcement operations against illegal employment and take stern action against errant employers. British Government and law courts please note.

» Government 'Less Than Frank' On Illegal Immigrants

A report published last month by the immigration think-tank Migrationwatch says the number of illegal immigrants in Britain could be 300,000 higher than the Government's estimate. It says the official estimate of between 310,000 and 570,000 is four years out of date and in any case failed to include children born in the UK to illegal migrants, which could add up to 85,000 children.

The Home Office estimate was based on 2001 Census data and had missed out record levels of immigration since then. In any case, Clive Wakely in an exclusive article in Identity, April, gave further proof that the Census grossly under-estimated the number of immigrants at that time.

» EU Whistleblower Persecuted

Several Euro MPs have expressed outrage over the treatment of an EU official, Dorte Schmidt-Brown of Denmark, who has been driven from her job for exposing widespread fraud at the European Commission's Eurostat data office. So far, no Eurostat official has been punished for the diversion of £3m of taxpayers funds into illegal accounts in a scam described as a "vast enterprise of looting". All the accused are still working for the EU or have retired with full pensions.

Dorte Schmidt-Brown fled home to Denmark after being subjected to a campaign of threats and harassment. The European Court of First Instance refused her claim for redress and ordered her to pay her own costs. Christ Heaton-Harris, a Tory MEP and leading anti-fraud campaigner, described the verdict as "disgusting", accusing Euro judges of closing ranks to defend the EU machine in every single case involving whistleblowers

» Church For Sale As Suitable Mosque

A sign of the weakening strength of Christianity throughout Europe and the rise of Islam comes with the news from Berlin of a fire-damaged church that has been put up for sale. The sale wording was "only one previous owner, would make a good mosque".

Following the fire, the Minister of the Protestant church said: "We need 2.5million euros (£1.6million) immediately just to fix the most pressing problems, and we simply don't have that kind of money. It would be totally suitable for a mosque."

» Black Americans Denied Heart Drug

The Guardian reported recently that a drug (BiDil) aimed at African-Americans to remedy heart failure is being opposed by some liberals because it will support the concept that there are biological differences between the races.

The U.S. Food & Drug Authority stamp of approval on the new drug will give the stamp of authority to those who believe there are racial biological differences, says Jonathan Kahn, a medical ethicist at Hamline University in St. Paul, Minnesota.

Among New Yorkers aged 45 to 54, the death rate among blacks is 55% higher than among whites.

Boys Need Education Too

» Last month we witnessed the annual ritual of young girls uttering squeals of delight on receiving the result of their A-levels. Boys were also included amongst the record number of 96.2% who had passed, but from the media coverage it would appear that they are of lesser importance than the girls - especially if those girls are in Muslim dress.

It would be churlish to deny that many of our young people have put a lot of hard work into gaining their A-levels, and particularly those who received A and B grades, but the glaring truth is that each year they have become easier to pass and in consequence are losing their value. As part of Labour's Soviet-style thinking, which includes "all must have prizes", they claim that the ever rising pass rate is because our students have become cleverer and our teachers are better.

As we are discussing education perhaps a rejoinder of "bollocks" is not really appropriate. It would be better to look at a report recently issued by the independent think-tank Reform. It concludes that evidence clearly suggests that the exam has become easier, even when the content has remained similar. It compares the A-level pass rate, which has gone up from 81% in 1993 to the present 96%, with that of the International Baccalaureate, which has hovered between 81 and 84%. The Reform study also concluded that a student achieving grade E in maths in 1988 would achieve a grade B now.

The whole point of our criticism is that the present education policy is failing our youth. The Simple Simon approach means that employers have lost all faith in today's A-levels being able to give a true indication of a young person's ability or for Universities to be able to select who will most benefit from a University education. Getting A-levels in media studies, psychology, and religious studies is easy, particularly when you can retake modules in these courses that you may have failed. What the nation needs is for students to stop quitting studies in maths, physics, chemistry, computers, foreign languages because they are more difficult.

Are The Boys Thick?

One of the few good points to come out of the latest A-level results is that boys seem to have stopped slipping any further behind the girls. Teenage boys at Britain's comprehensive schools are now used to being told that compared to girls they are thick. This misconception has come about because it's the girls who show better concentration, better clerical skills, and produce more consistent termwork and coursework that give them higher final grades. The boys, who, where some discipline still exists, often produce better exam results, have in the main accepted this lower status. For many, their last male refuge is sport - and particularly football. Now, political correctness is trying to spread sex egalitarianism into this final male bastion.

Is it any wonder that many boys have been conditioned into believing they have no role in society and have opted out, with more young males than young women being unemployed? From a BBC Blue Peter programme I recall watching with one of my visiting grand-daughters, it would appear that even boys' long-held career aspirations of being a train driver is out of bounds. A girl standing on a steam engine footplate at York Railway Museum talked learnedly of the mechanical requirements of the train of the future. Back in the studio a sheepish young man continued the railway theme by showing us how to make a chocolate cake in the shape of a locomotive engine. Full marks for the PC programme producer!

Some teenage boys are encouraged even further to opt out of society when they look at TV and start to think it is a woman's world (as Michael Buerke, the former BBC TV news reader said last month). They will see that when a programme wishes to obtain the views of a business sector on some specific issue it is now invariably a woman who is the 'spokesperson', whether it is insurance, food and drink, industry, the CBI, or whatever.

I would stress that my argument on this matter is not motivated by misogyny. Contrary to the impression the feminists try to give the bemused public of today, up until the early sixties if girls had the necessary talent and enthusiasm they could virtually enter any profession they liked. Admittedly very few were to be found in engineering, but this was mainly due to their lack of interest in the subject. In science women have always been well represented and have been among the pioneers of major developments. In many years in industrial chemistry I worked happily with women colleagues.

How did this artificial conflict between the sexes that has played its part in the disintegration of our society come about? It stems from the work of a tiny minority of crypto-Marxist women, aided by males of the same political persuasion. The fall of the Soviet Empire may have removed these people's principal flag bearer, but the campaign to destroy the old structure of the nation states of the West continues, and nowhere more so than in the schools.

The Death Of The Multi-Cultural Fantasy

» Nick Griffin says that the multi-cultural fantasy that has dominated and twisted British life for three or four decades is dead. Dangerous remnants will cling on for a while, but the central core ideas - that 'diversity' is an absolute good and that all members of all ethnic minorities are better than the hideously white natives of these islands - died with the victims in the debris on the pavement around that bombed-out London bus. However, New Labour and the rest of the old party System are determined that the BNP shall not benefit as a result and will stop at nothing to halt our growth.

» Now that multi-culturalism has received its death blow the still unanswered question is what will replace it? The logical and just answer would be a truly revolutionary (in the true, 'returning to origins', meaning of the word) shift towards a BNP-led operation to reverse and undo the entire multi-racial 'experiment'.

The only guaranteed answer to the problems and dangers inflicted on us all by 'diversity' is action to reduce that 'diversity'. The only sure-fire way to end the hatred, instability, murder and horror visited on us by multi-racialism and multi-culturalism is to return, as quickly and as far as is humanely, practicably and politically possible, to the more homogeneous Britain for which the heroes of the first two World Wars fought and died.

Unfortunately, however, our out-of-touch political and media elite have one more trick to play before admitting that their game is up and either adopting our analysis and policies wholesale, or suffering from a collective loss of confidence that will - for one of those rare and brief moments in history - leave their power lying unattended in the gutter waiting to be picked up by a sufficiently well-organised alternative political force.

Their new trick involves paying lip-service - and vast sums of taxpayers' money - to an American-style 'One out of many' version of 'Britishness'. Lessons in how best to milk the system that we pay for will henceforth go hand in hand with plastic lectures on citizenship, 'moderation' and 'tolerance' of other favoured minorities, such as homosexuals.

We have just seen the end of the part of the farce in which every featherless biped in the world that walked (or, in the case of that one-legged Albanian roofer, hopped) through our front door was encouraged to retain and celebrate the attitudes, culture, beliefs and identity which, as a general rule, had helped to make their ancestral lands places that were better left behind.

ABSURD

Now that it has become all too clear where that particular path leads to, the final stages in the sorry and bloody farce of mass immigration will see an even more absurd scheme imposed on us at our expense. The opening lines of this last act were recited by that wicked apologist for terror and friend of terrorists, Ken Livingstone. His 'answer' to the Muslim extremists - his claim that the thousands of new potential fifth columnists pouring into our capital city every week become instant 'Londoners' - plumbed new depths of idiocy and contempt for the silent majority.

But it also provided the cue for a whole chorus of supposedly more sensible Establishment voices to chime in with the same message: "From now on everyone here is going to be 'British', or else we'll, we'll... we'll ... not be very happy about it and might stop their benefits for a week... well, a day at least."

This, remember, is the same ruling elite that has spent forty years doing its utmost to destroy everything that could even remind us of what being British in general and English in particular used to mean. But now that the word has become a useful propaganda tool, they claim to be able to find a process which will instantly turn several million inassimilable and highly radicalised foreigners into 'British people' (you've probably noticed how the real word, 'Britons', is still too un-PC to be acceptable).

This is the political and social version of the self-delusion and exploitation of human gullibility that once had generations believing that alchemists really could turn base metals into gold.

Still, the multi-racial play must go on until the final curtain falls on the bloody, flame-illuminated stage. And this brings me to the main point of this month's article: What is going to happen to us in the BNP, and what must we do to maximise our impact, during this last act of the tragedy?

As you probably already realise, we're extremely unpopular with the producers of this play, because we're the people who are shouting out the warning that the theatre is on fire, and that the end of the play isn't even worth staying to watch, let alone risking life and limb to see.

The weeks after July 7th saw a very significant increase in the political and media pressure building up to "ban the British National Party", but the idea was already in circulation before the latest London bombings. The careless arrogance of David Blunkett has been a particularly good source of information.

First there was his widely quoted radio interview in which he remarked that he wished that, as Home Secretary, he had "the power to ban the BNP." Just weeks after that apparently unscripted, but in hindsight probably deliberate, comment, he introduced Labour's proposals for the Civil Contingency Bill, now a law which bears a remarkable and sinister resemblance to the Nazi Enabling Act that Hitler went on to use to fulfil his election pledge to eliminate multi-party democracy in Germany.

More recently, at the general election count in Sheffield Blunkett lashed out at BNP activists celebrating our very encouraging votes in 'his' city by openly stating that "this is the last election the BNP will be standing in."

Was Blunkett alluding to plans since publicised by his colleagues in his old department to make saying and doing things which, in the Government's opinion, threaten social cohesion and "inter-communal relations", grounds under which the Home Secretary can outlaw even wholly peaceful and legitimate political opposition? Challenged on Radio 4 to say whether these new proposed powers would be used to ban us, Labour Home Office big cheese Hazel Blears pointedly refused to say 'no', and twice gave a weasel-worded answer that clearly left the possibility open.

When a Government that has repeatedly displayed extremely totalitarian instincts comes up with two separate 'laws' granting itself the power to ban democratic but rival political parties, and when two of the most powerful figures in that Government repeatedly indicate their willingness - in the case of Blunkett, eagerness - to use that power against the BNP, then it seems a trifle unlikely that they're having a bit of a joke at our expense. We are not dealing, after all, with Black Adder's Queen Elizabeth the First, but with post-Stalinist bigots who have no sense of humour whatsoever.

So let us assume that their threats and manoeuvres mean what they appear to mean. How will they go about it? That, I believe, depends in large measure on external circumstances which are almost as much beyond their control as they are ours.

The Labour government wants to murder the British National Party, that much is clear. They are, however, sure to be aware of the danger of handing to us a collective halo of martyrdom that might in the end allow us to benefit from the terrifying (for manipulators and tyrants throughout history) power of the Law of Unintended Consequences.

Using the full repressive power of a State machine that is already widely despised by its over-taxed and cynical citizens against a small but rapidly growing rival, clearly innocent of anything but telling the truth and irritating Government ministers, is an extraordinarily risky business.

Throughout history there are countless virtually forgotten examples of this having been done successfully. On the other hand, precisely the same stunt is invariably seen as a key factor in the history of almost every successful revolution in history. One act of repression can be a success for a tyranny, while the orders for another turn out to be the old regime's own death warrant. When the coin is tossed, no one can tell for sure which side will come down face up.

So if the movers and shakers of the Blair regime have any sense (and bearing in mind the ruthless efficiency with which they have gone about eliminating so much of our traditional freedom and identity, they cannot all be written off as halfwits) they will not want to be seen to crush a successful British National Party that is gaining in popularity and public support.

The only thing to make them rush into such action is therefore likely to be the development of a set of external circumstances in which other considerations override the martyrdom concerns, giving them either a really good excuse or an extremely pressing reason to move against us while we are still on the 'up'.

POSSIBLE INTIFADA RIOTS

At present, such a situation might, for example, be produced by a wave of Muslim community riots in response to police stop-and-search operations and the raids on family homes or mosques that could precede the expulsion of locally popular Islamic radicals. Faced with the need to placate 'moderate' Muslims, to prove even-handedness and to demonise those in the majority community who are losing patience with our millions of uninvited guests, it could be overwhelmingly convenient for the Blair regime to use its powers to intern without trial against several dozen key BNP officials at the same time as against Islamists.

In my opinion the bricks-and-petrol-bomb-riots Islamic youth Intifada which would be at the heart of the scenario above is now inevitable. That does not, however, mean that it is going to happen tomorrow, or even in the next few months. Especially if the post July 21st lull in Islamic terror attacks in Britain continues, things might well calm down for a while.

If they do, then the odds are that Labour's plan to murder the BNP will be carried out more carefully, with those responsible feeling that they can take their time and get it right, by waiting until we are perceived by the public as a spent force of 'trouble-makers' rather than as an increasingly popular focus for legitimate political dissent.

How on earth could that happen, many readers may ask themselves? After all, this is the party which just a few months ago set itself the target of doubling its number of elected representatives to fifty in the next council elections. It is a party which won record votes in this year's General Election. Most of all, it is a party whose core position and message has just been more thoroughly vindicated by the turn of events than has happened to any figure in British politics since Winston Churchill in 1940. How could the BNP go from such a position to being capable of being portrayed even by a hostile media as a spent force?

Well, here's one of the periodic bombshells for which my columns have become renowned: Unfortunately easily, and the process is under way right now. In fact it has been since just weeks after we set ourselves the ambitious, but at the time reasonably achievable, 50 Seat target just after the General Election.

We first saw the possible warning signs in a council by-election in Stoke, a couple of months before the main election. Clearly terrified by our potential in the Stoke Mayoral election (held on the same day as the parliamentary ones), our Establishment opponents ran a multi-faceted and closely co-ordinated campaign which exceeded anything we had ever seen before. A tremendous personal effort by our candidate, Spencer Cartlidge, a record effort by our local activists, and very significant outside help on top of that meant that we got a tremendous vote - but we didn't win the seat.

Then, not long after the General Election and our announcing our 50 Seat target, we went into another council by-election campaign, in which we were forced to defend the seat in Goresbrook that we had won with a record percentage late last year.

Once again, our candidate, this time Lawrence Rustem, worked incredibly hard, as did a well-directed and dedicated team of experienced activists. And, once again, an very cynical, corrupt and energetic campaign by a united front of Establishment parties both outgunned and outfought us.

In the wake of Stoke and Goresbrook we have to face a new reality: Under present political circumstances, and without significant improvements in our own ability to sink community roots and to maximise our campaigning efficiency, we may well now be unable to win any more council by-elections.

Needless to say, those present circumstances will sooner or later be transformed by the continued economic and social effects of Labour's globalisation mania, and by further developments in the Clash of Civilisations in which, thanks to the war criminal Blair, Britain is now in the front line. But until that happens this is the grim reality of our present situation.

The Establishment parties have finally worked out how to deal with the BNP election-winning machine that for a while was smacking them all around the ring. Until we in turn develop fresh ways to up our own game - qualitatively as well as quantitatively - we are going to be out-pointed again and again.

At major elections, in which we are contesting hundreds of seats on the same day, it will of course be impossible for our opponents to concentrate their fire on one place, so winning fresh seats next May remains a very real possibility. Unfortunately, however, there can be no doubt that the lessons our opponents have learnt in recent by-election campaigns (and major research projects run during them) will be rolled out in BNP seats which are up for re-election next May.

Very special efforts are going to be made - nay, are already being made - by the other parties in our heartland areas to take back those seats. Some we should be able to hold, but anywhere our councillors have been a bit unlucky, over-confident or complacent about telling the public just how much they have been able to get done, we are likely to lose those seats next May.

Even in places where we have never yet even won seats, there are clear signs that our obvious target wards are already being worked with professionally directed and externally funded campaigns by whichever Establishment party is best positioned to keep us out.

Put all those efforts together, add in the media smears which we will face as May approaches, and the vote splitting efforts of system-sponsored 'rivals', and it is clear that while the potential to double the number of seats is still there, so is the possibility that we could see the number we hold halved at a stroke. That in turn would add to the pressure on the next wave up for election the following year, and so on, until three or four short years from now even our best councillors cannot hold our last few elected outposts and we find ourselves back at square one with no seats at all.

If that prospect shocks and worries you, good, because it's all too real; we're up against ruthless and capable opponents, and they have set their black hearts on wiping us off the political map.

HOW WE CAN COUNTER-ATTACK

The good news, however, is that we don't have to sit back and let them get what they want. Our election-winning machine continues to learn, evolve and improve. We are learning all the time about the value of Community Associations and similar local grass-roots organisations.

Such groups provide the ideal field in which future candidates can win their spurs by using the tactic of "act as if". This is a tried-and-tested psychological trick (against your own subconscious limiting factors as much as onlookers) whereby anyone who wants to achieve anything takes a massive step towards that goal by acting as if they have already done so. "Acting as if" already elected provides ideal opportunities to gain in experience and to build up a track record for caring and getting things done on behalf of local residents. The word-of-mouth recommendations that follow are far more effective when it comes to getting votes than a mad rush of activity a couple of weeks before the actual election.

In many of the wards we hold at present our councillors have grown into their positions and are doing incredibly effective work on behalf of their electors. This experience can be rolled out in target wards by new candidates teaming up with existing BNP councillors to watch them at work helping their residents or playing an active role in council meetings

The £50,000-worth of extra digital printshop equipment we bought in the run-up to the General Election gives us more capability than we have ever had to produce good quality, highly targeted campaign literature. In both existing seats and target wards we can use such equipment to offset the lies of our opponents by distributing positive newsletters (which can even be personalised down to a few streets in each corner of the ward at very little extra cost or effort) highlighting the things that BNP councillors achieve for their constituents.

Freedom can be sold door-to-door. Setting up a regular round not only acts as a canvassing operation but also provides a perfect way to pick up local intelligence, as well as recruiting potential new activists and candidates and providing a regular income to cover other campaign costs.

Such operations may seem really quite simple - and indeed they are - but the number of places where they are done well and consistently has up until now been frankly pretty limited. Putting this right is therefore the key to improving our prospects in so many target wards that our ability to win seats once again leapfrogs our opponents' ability to keep us out.

If enough members increase their personal input to make this happen in enough new areas, then our opponents will find that opposing the BNP is like trying to fight a wildfire on a windy day - just as they begin to think they've got things under control in one place they notice that sparks have caused three or four new fires. With enough effort from us to make this happen in enough places, our enemies will end up collapsing with exhaustion and giving up on their special efforts to keep us out.

We don't need people to reinvent the wheel, just to do the relatively simple things that we know from experience really work. We don't need rocket scientists, we need individuals who are prepared to make an effort and take responsibility for their own patch.

We also need more new recruits, which is why, over this autumn, we expect younger activists in particular to get out to markets and shopping precincts and big sporting fixtures and to sell *Freedom*s and hand out leaflets. Take a Union Jack and your local national Saint's flag along on neat poles as well - they draw attention and attract the punters like nothing else. These activities are great fun, often much more exciting than leafleting or canvassing, and help to build a real sense of comradeship and esprit de corps, especially among newer members who weren't involved in the old days when being an active nationalist was way much harder than it is today.

NEW CAMPAIGNS

Later this autumn we're planning a big campaign about the hidden epidemic of race attacks and murders on white victims all over Britain. This needs to be rolled out in target wards and new areas alike.

If we do only new recruitment work the resulting neglect of our key seats and targets would mean that we would lose seats overall next May. But if we only do work in those already established areas then we will fail to recruit the enthusiastic new manpower we need to keep the BNP bushfire spreading faster than our opponents' ability to stamp it out in limited areas. We have to find the energy and the personnel to do both at once. Can you help?

Beyond that, for a few particularly gifted or keen volunteers, there is a great deal of work to be done which, in the short-term at least, isn't even connected with elections. Especially in some of Britain's "hideously white" 'backwaters' where we don't yet have real electoral resonance, old hands and new recruits alike can get involved in helping to set up and run nationwide special interest groups to attract fresh supporters in new fields or new issues.

Whether these are actual BNP Circles on issues such as the environment, the family or culture, or perhaps single issue front groups, these have great potential not only to bring new people into the party, but also to help to create the general climate in which our ideas and interests advance. Helping to establish a St George's Day celebration committee in your area, to give just one example, is an effort which is full of symbolic, moral and thoroughly practical possibilities for the future.

At a time of such uncertainty and fast-moving events, that future is necessarily uncertain. All we can know for sure is that there will be further history-making events that will open up huge opportunities for our movement.

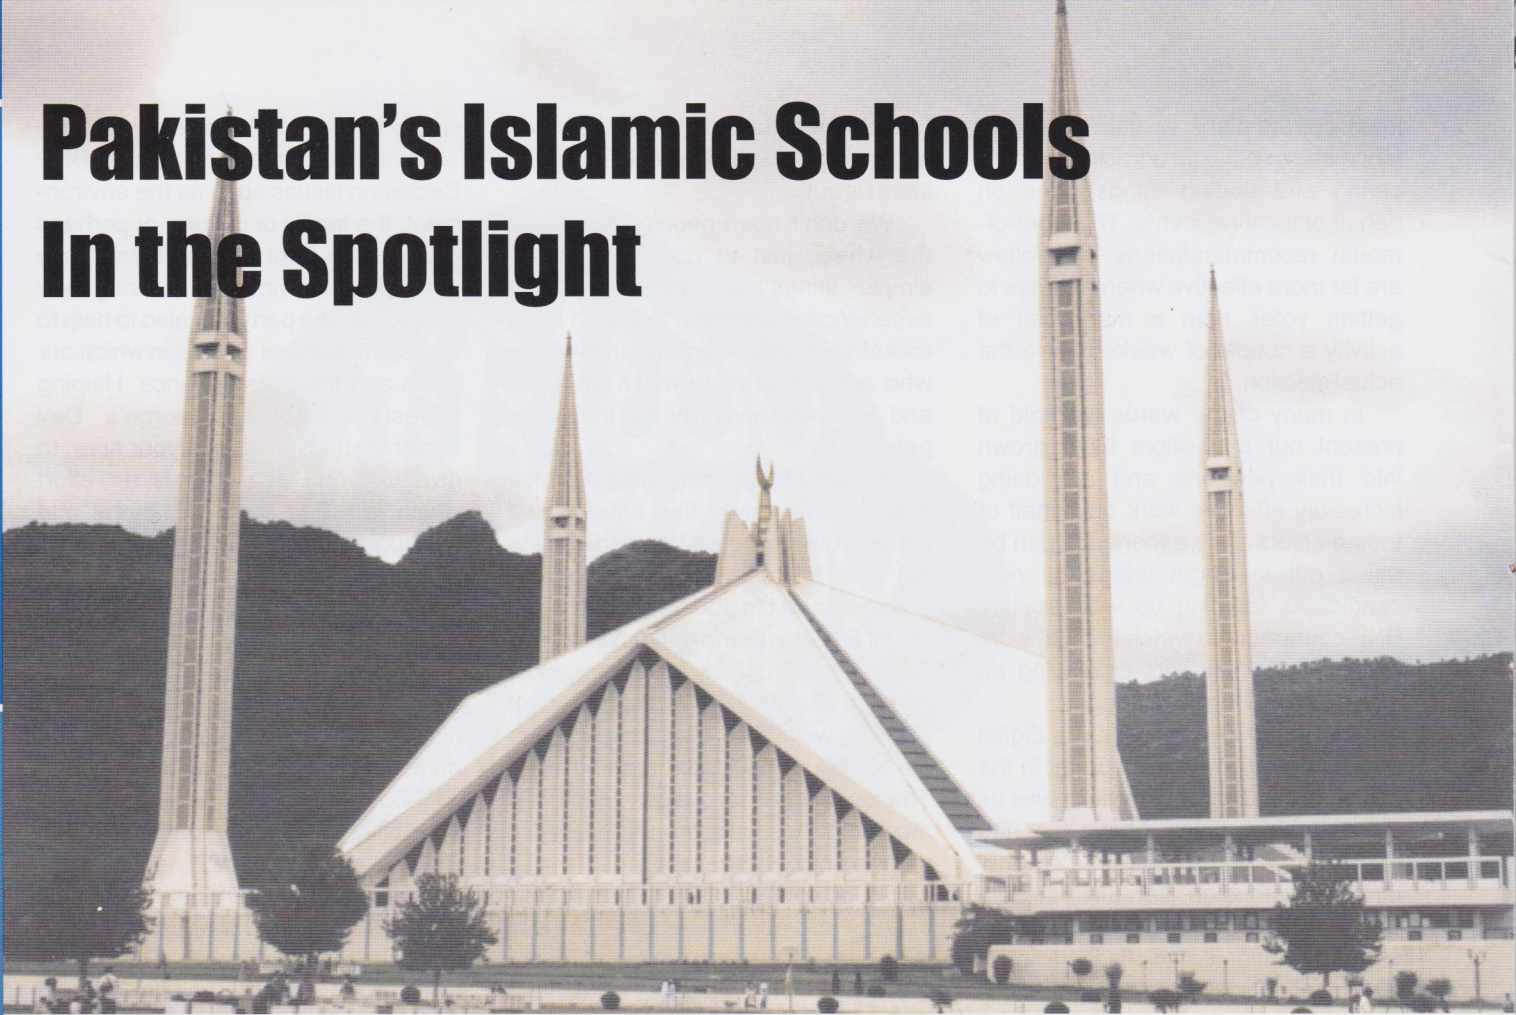

Above all, there is the distinct possibility that the long patience of the British electorate will snap very suddenly. But, even if that happens, it is not pre-ordained that we will automatically reap the benefit. There is no value whatsoever in sitting around waiting for things to go wrong for the existing System and expecting to be able to walk over and pick up the pieces.

We have to have done the work in advance to build a credible political organisation capable of using power wisely, as well as parallel structures that undermine or replace institutions and social functions which are at present the preserve of the liberal-left Establishment. Such structures, outside the field of conventional party politics, are necessary either to withstand repression if unleashed, or to give us victory in depth if events and public opinion shift decisively in our favour and thwart Labour's drift to totalitarianism.

But, even as we work on building them, we must redouble our efforts - house-by-house, street-by-street and ward-by-ward - to hold and win council seats. For winning in those local contests not only provides the best deterrent possible against New Labour's totalitarianism. It will also one day provide the springboard to the far bigger electoral successes by which the British public will recognise the fact that our persistence, foresight and dogged courage under political fire mark us out as the only people who can save this country and provide a future for the generations to come.

Pakistan's Islamic Schools In the Spotlight

» Martin Roberts reports on Pakistan's madrassas where several Islamic terrorists, including two of those responsible for the London bombings have been brainwashed by fundamentalist extremists. It is significant that their curriculum has not been changed since 1057 and recent attempts to introduce maths, science and IT were rejected by most of the schools.

» News that two of the London suicide bombers studied at a Muslim religious school - or madrassa - in Pakistan has once again raised questions over the country's sprawling system of religious education and what it is producing.

Shehzad Tanweer's family said that he attended a madrassa for two months in the city of Lahore. That has led to intense media speculation in Britain that he may have been "brainwashed" into carrying out the attacks.

It is acknowledged that some madrassas are moderate institutions, providing much needed education and board and lodgings for poorer students. The Koran is studied intensively. But are some of them "breeding-grounds of terror"?

It is estimated that there are now around 20,000 madrassas in Pakistan, compared to around 137 at the time of partition in 1947. According to the Pakistani newspaper The News there are today around 1.7 million students who attend such institutions, mainly from poor rural families.

The reasons for the huge growth in the number of madrassas dates back to 1979, when the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan led to large amounts of money flowing into Pakistan from the West and countries in the Gulf.

Much of this money was directed towards madrassas, and was used by anti-Soviet Mujahideen groups to provide religious and military training for thousands of young fighters prepared to fight the Russians. Students ('tales') from Pakistani madrassas were often in the frontlines of the Mujahideen groups that drove the Soviets out of Afghanistan.

TALIBAN CONNECTIONS

Most members of the Taliban government overthrown by the Americans following the 11th September, 2001 attacks in the United States had attended madrassas in Pakistan. Narrow-minded hardliners trained in madrassas have also been blamed for outbreaks of sectarian violence over the last decade in Pakistan in which hundreds of Shias and Sunnis have been killed.

Critics of the madrassas focus on the narrow curriculum often taught. "Many students develop an intolerant, prejudiced... and narrow-minded view of the world," says Pakistani journalist Ahmed Rashid.

He says that a few hardline madrassas in Pakistan employ teachers sympathetic to al-Qaeda, who encourage students to join extremist groups in Kashmir and Chechnya. "They gradually become radicalised through this process," he says, "so that it would be no surprise if they ended up joining al-Qaeda."

Many conservative Pakistani families in Britain and elsewhere in the West send their children to madrassas in Pakistan for between six to nine months to complete their children's education. "The trouble is that many, like Shehzad Tanweer, find this process disorientating and end up more confused than when they arrived," Ahmed Rashid says.

In 2001 - shortly after the attack on the World Trade Centre - President Musharraf pledged to reform Pakistan's network of madrassas by making it compulsory for them to register with the authorities and by introducing a wider syllabus which would not focus entirely on studying the Koran.

There is "little visible sign" that this has been accomplished, most reforms are "cosmetic" due to the reluctance of many madrassas to accept government interference and the desire of the authorities not to alienate influential Muslim organisations.

LEVELS OF HATRED

Darul Uloom Haqqania seminary in North West Frontier Province, is known by students and its principal as the University of Holy War.

Here students dedicate their lives to "jihad" and "killing infidels and enemies of Islam". The European Parliament in April refused to meet a delegation of Pakistani MPs that included Senator Maulana Sami ul-Haq, the head of the "university", because of its links to the Taliban. "Although institutions like this are not quite so upfront about their activities today, there is no doubt that levels of hatred and extremism against the West remain," Mr Rashid says.

Experts like Burhanuddin Hasan, former Director of Pakistan Television, state that the overwhelming majority of Pakistan's madrassas are moderate and provide education to students who otherwise would not have the opportunity.

"But since they are taught neither English nor science, they risk becoming complete misfits in modern Pakistani society," he argues. "These days they cannot render any useful service to the nation other than performing religious rites at marriages."

Play Them at Their Own Game

» Matthew Bedford, a Croydon BNP member, suggests that as there are thousands of things in our PC society we can challenge, we should all make a point of doing so, thus helping weaken the pillars of multi-culturalism.

» In our society we are bombarded daily with cultural awareness and political diversity through all facets of the media: through our radios, newspapers, and TV. We have PC racial awareness courses shoved in our faces in our schools and at work. When is it going to end? The PC society will seek out and pursue every opportunity to push forward its beliefs and values against our own.

I'm sure that in the future they will become more and more determined and cunning in their attempts. But you've got to ask yourself one important question: how did it get to this stage? The answer is relatively simple. It is done one stage at a time. The liberal-left Establishment know they cannot change a society overnight in its beliefs and values. So it is done slowly, just watching and waiting to exploit every opportunity to come its way.

This process comes into action by starting from the top of each strata of society and working its way down. Promotion of ethnic groups and multi-racialism is started in the music industry. Then through our universities going down to colleges, high schools etc (again helped by the lib-left). Then by our government pushing downwards towards the local level. These few examples among many are to illustrate the point of how the multi-cultural political philosophy is started at the top of so many aspects of our lives and pushes its way down.

The basic belief of multi-culturalism is a society where all political and ethnic groups of all backgrounds come together in harmony and peace. Its main tactic is to show how individual races and religious cultural uniqueness stand out and enrich each other. Superficially this sounds good in theory.

MULTI-CULTURALISM CANNOT UNITE

Yes, in theory multi-culturalism can show the achievement and success of each ethnic group. But it does not unite. It just creates tension and rivalry amongst each group. But today's PC brigade still continues to push on relentlessly even though it has failed in its main goal.

It continues because it failed to unite the ethnic minorities but it managed to divide us as a nation. Genders, different Christian faiths and different geographical locations (i.e. cities versus the suburbs, north and south etc). It even goes down to the different football teams. It has sharpened our individual strengths and made us compete against each other.

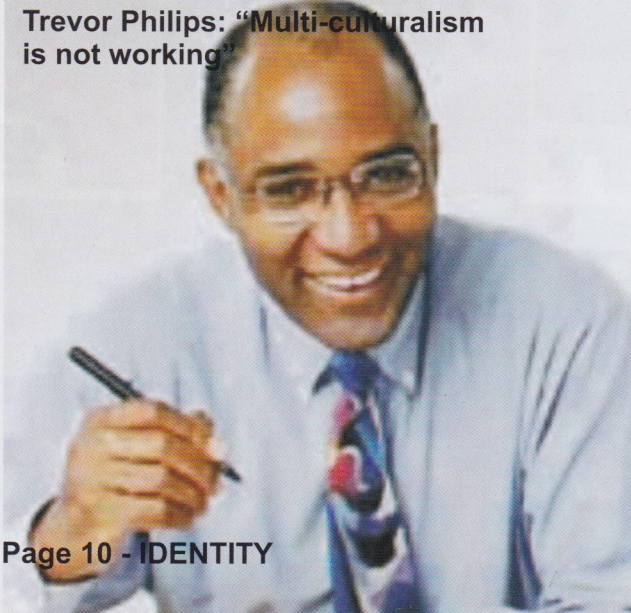

It will continue to push forward its beliefs in new areas. It will encounter resistance and resort to overcome this by just shouting that magic word of 'racist'. It is important that we need to change our tactics and hit back in places where we thought it impossible.

We need to play their game of divide and conquer. We must try and push back British and nationalist beliefs into lost territory. Re-educate the generations of their proud past and rich historical heritage; remind them we have a rich heritage and culture already that comprises of more than just the stereotypical belief that our enemies are trying to put over that all we have produced is fish and chips.

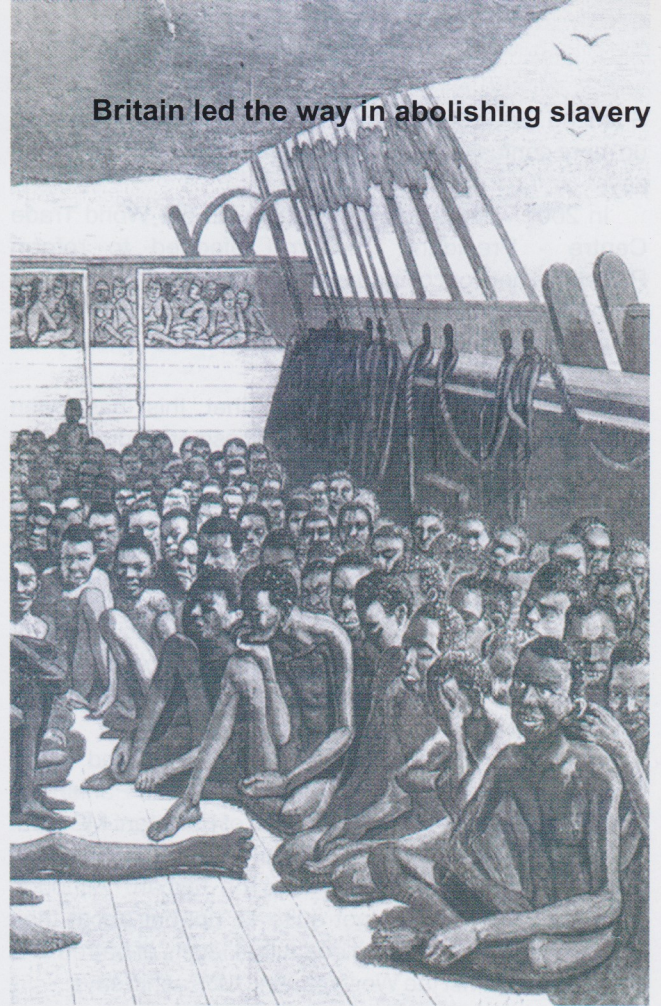

If multi-culturalism loses its foundations its whole political philosophy and ideology will implode. In relevant terms it won't have a leg to stand on. For example I remember back in my history lessons at school only a few years ago that we were taught that Britain had established an evil empire and imperialism was grown off the backs of slavery. Well yes you can't deny that some aspects of the empire weren't all good.

But there are always two sides to a story. Fact; we helped bring about an end to slavery early in the foundation of our empire. This was almost a century before other European powers did so. We went further and made sure the slave trade was ended altogether. It should also not be forgotten that the empire made world peace a reality. Imperialism may no longer work in a modern day society, but in the past it did. It was the norm for thousands of years throughout human history.

Trevor Philips: "Multi-culturalism is not working"

Britain led the way in abolishing slavery

There are thousands of little things we can challenge in a PC society. By doing this we could challenge and weaken the pillars of multi-culturalism. It has taken more and more of a physical form and is in consequence easier to challenge than at any other point in history.

One at a time should be the name of the game. There is a long hill that we need to climb. Each step will be a battle and debate. Proof that multi-culturalism has failed in its attempts to overrun the British people has been freely admitted by perhaps its most powerful tool: Trevor Philips of the CRE. He has been quoted as saying 'multi-culturalism is not working'. He knows like many others that to create their united ethnic utopia they need to change their tactics and pursue a whole new political doctrine.

They can't do this because they would need to create an opposing political ideology to go against the one they've already established through multi-culturalism. They have the added problem that their society has failed to create any real philosophers who can implement a whole new political PC philosophy. Who are going to be their philosophers? It takes many, many years and many generations for so many different ethnic groups to form a distinct culture. It can't be done overnight, which multi-culturalism wants to do. We have no need to change our values or political ideology but simply our tactics. No I'm not saying we should give up ground we still hold. We can defend this and counter-attack in the places that have already been taken. In our music, literature and in our theatres. Like them we should challenge them in so many different places they won't be able to see where we are coming from. The list is long but just start from the beginning.

Whites Must Breed or Face Extinction

» The following report by Esther Harstein appeared last month on the website of "America's Voices", which is a forum for Conservative Americans.

» In a little over 10 years, the world's population has grown by a whopping 1 billion.

Despite enormous efforts by international population funds, this trend continues. However, many experts have not given us a true assessment of the situation. The world is not overpopulated. It is the Third World that is overpopulated. White people (pardon the expression) are actually experiencing a population decline.

Here are some facts about the direction of the world's ethnic makeup:

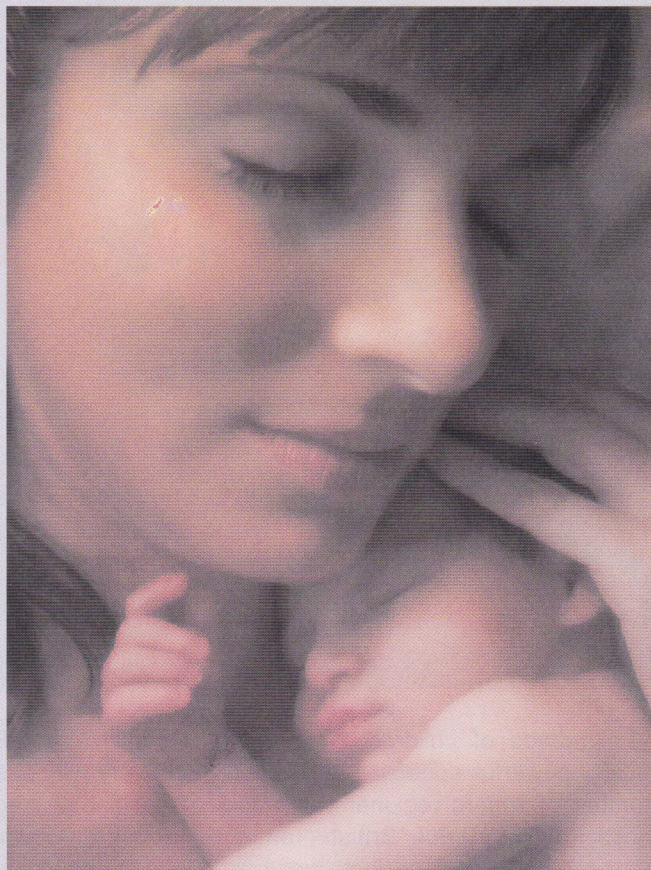

- There are 14 babies born for every 1,000 White women.
 - There are 28 babies born for every 1,000 Black women.
 - There are 98 babies born for every 1,000 Hispanic women.
 - There are 4.5 million Norwegians, 129.9 million Nigerians.
 - There are 8.1 million Austrians, 32.2 million Algerians.
- It is estimated that in 47 years, 40% of Southern Europe will be seniors [pensioners - Ed].

This is one of the ironies of low birth rates: Intended to decrease a society's number of dependents in favour of an increased proportion of able, educated producers, they have produced a new class of dependents: the elderly.

Europe has sadly chosen to bog itself down with elderly care rather than child care, and its population is shrinking. In the meantime, non-white immigrants thunder into Europe, threatening to take over with their superior numbers. It is estimated that France will be a Muslim country in 35 years. Within a 100 years, the whole of Europe will follow.

Whites have to pick their burdens: children, or seniors and immigrants. A society composed of able-bodied, dependent-free adults is not a possibility as long as the Third World puts out 79 million babies a year. To prevent white extinction, the Arabisation of Europe, and the Latinisation of the United States, whites must breed. four children per couple should be a national goal.

More babies will do more to society than preserve its ethnic makeup. It will preserve its cultural makeup as well. In Europe, most immigrants are Muslim. These newcomers come from societies that practice customs such as slavery, public death by stoning, and female genital mutilation. A Europe where they are the majority would not be the liberal place it is now. In Holland and Denmark, Islamic leaders have called for courts run according to sharia, or Islamic Law. This does not bode well for the white people who were so kind as to let these newcomers in.

A baby boom will also improve a sluggish economy. Western governments have cut taxes, cut interest rates, and encouraged consumer spending. However, the economy is still in poor shape. More kids means an increase in toy sales, an increase in children's book sales, an increased demand for diapers (nappies) and health services, etc. In lieu of another solution to our economic problems, babies are the only answer.

A higher white birthrate will protect domestic industry. It will provide a cheaper domestic labour force that will discourage businesses from recruiting foreigners or moving overseas. Hey, it's better a bad job than no job.

The bottom line is, white people need more babies. There is nothing an infertile society stands to gain; if it will not breed, it will have immigrants and seniors to care for instead. Incomprehensible sums of money have been spent trying to get the Third World to have less children; so far these attempts have been unsuccessful. If the world is to be overpopulated, then whites should jump on board. Or risk extinction.

Low white birthrate + high non-white birthrate + skyrocketing immigration = RACE SUICIDE!
Four+ Kids per White Family = RACE SURVIVAL!

Red-White-and-Blue 2005

Best of the Six!

» Hundreds of children, great live music, powerful speeches, a record number of superb regional and local stalls, a wonderful British family atmosphere, even perfect weather RWB 2005 had it all!

Many with fond memories of previous Red-White-and-Blues found it hard to imagine that this year's could be even better, but as car- and minibus loads of revellers waved goodbye to the beautiful Sawley site for another year, everybody knew that RWB 2005 was the best yet.

Even those old hands who can remember the close-knit comradeship created by the appalling weather at the infamously wet Welsh RWB in 2001 agreed that this was the year when the Red-White-and-Blue "came together" in every way possible. Nick and Suzy Cass had worked tirelessly for months to build the organising team, and all the effort by so many people really paid off.

Thanks to tremendous efforts by the set-up team - mainly from Burnley and other local BNP branches - the hundreds of campers streaming onto the site on the Friday evening and Saturday morning saw the largest ever arena, bordered by marquees for all sorts of displays and refreshments, two forty-foot trailer stages, fairground rides and sideshows, and a whole 12-yard marquee packed with Excalibur merchandise.

A record number of regional and local stalls competed for the attention and spending-power of the crowd. They ranged from the West Country's offer of "Cyder and Sedition", through the multi-faceted North West display (everything from Blackpool rock to a war-gaming table) right up to the First Prize-winning Scottish stall, complete with samples of haggis, oatcakes and other Scottish delicacies, served by, among others, the kilted editor of the British Nationalist members' bulletin, Kenny Smith.

The central arena saw a variety of events for both children and adults, with a display of defensive martial arts moves proving particularly popular. Off the main field the highlights included the clay pigeon-shooting, children's pony and trap rides, and - at last, after several years of dashed hopes - eight-minute helicopter flights giving a really special view of the Red-White-and-Blue and the spectacular surrounding Lancashire countryside.

Halifax branch's hog roast

The double stage innovation allowed a record number of acts to play throughout the Saturday and all Sunday morning, since one stage was used for the current performance while the next artiste or group set up and got ready to perform.

Late Saturday afternoon Robert Baggs, head of the BNP's Personnel Department, took to the stage to introduce the political speeches. These included popular well known speakers such as Simon Darby, Mark Collett and Jonathon Bowden as well as new talent - including a brilliant speech by YBNP member James Readman.

The musical entertainment included more BNP musicians and singers than ever. Among them, Lee Haggan, Dave Hannam, Julie, Frank and Colin all played and sang their hearts out with a mixture of traditional folk and modern political protest songs, many of which will be appearing shortly on the first CD releases from Great White Records.

Other individuals and groups including a cracking first-time together performance by a rock band from Keighley BNP - performed cover versions of well-known songs by various artistes. The music continued late into Saturday evening, with a burst of powerful classical music co-ordinated with a fantastic professional firework display. It concluded with a set of songs with good choruses led by a scratch 'BNP choir' including event organiser Nick Cass, Nick Griffin and several of the earlier singers.

Hundreds of merry-makers joined in with the well-known lyrics of BNP favourites such as 'All Stand Together' and 'The Rising Sun' before turning in, or gathering around some of the many barbeques where friends old and new chatted long into the night as a huge full moon rose above Pendle Hill and sailed over the neat rows of tents in quiet English fields.

Sunday morning saw the party's national press officer, Dr. Phil Edwards, showing off a very different talent with a relaxing classical piano recital. Although Sunday was billed as the main 'political' day, the main marquee saw a series of different educational events over both days, including hostile press interviews conducted with aggressive relish by Jonathan Bowden and Tony Lecomber, two different Question Times with senior party officials and a YBNP panel, and seminars by the BNPTv team and on local leaflet production by Mark Collett.

In addition to the great speeches by party officials and members, we were also honoured with a pair of thought-provoking and moving orations by our overseas guest speakers, Vavra Suk of Sweden's National Democrats and Jean-Michel Girard of the Front National. As with the best of the other speeches, these will be released in due course in DVD format, so those who missed the event itself are best to wait to see the recordings rather than reading a long and dry report here.

As Sunday's events drew to a close, Debbie Stafford - who did a tremendous job organising the biggest variety of children's events of any RWB, including a Bug Hunt which ended up attracting nearly a hundred eager creepy-crawly hunters - led a parade of children around the showground.

This was followed by Nick Griffin's closing address, which examined the causes and consequences of the London Bombings, and looked ahead to the dangers and opportunities facing the British National Party as he and Mark Collett face their high-profile Race Act trial.

For many, the moment when Nick was joined on stage by his family was the most emotion-charged event of the whole weekend, and everyone who saw and heard the message came away determined to redouble their efforts to make the Blair regime pay dearly for trying to imprison patriots simply for telling the truth.

Oldham BNP's now traditional donation of a huge net full of red, white and blue balloons had an extra poignant twist this year, with nearly one hundred yellow ones as well one for each British soldier killed in Blair's futile and unnecessary war in Iraq. These were released during Nick's closing address, floating high over the Pennine "Backbone of England" as he spoke of the way in which the Labour government had put everyone in Britain in the frontline of a war that has nothing to do with us.

At about 1,850, the overall attendance was slightly down on last year, as a direct result of our decision not to advertise the event on the Internet and to ban groups of single males who were not party members. Together with excellent low-key but firm work by the BNP Security Team, this made the entire RWB a real British National Party family event, with a gentle and friendly atmosphere from start to finish.

With the lessons and improvements from this one firmly under our belts, we can go on to organise with confidence to make RWB 2006 even better and much, much bigger.

Branches and groups up and down the country should take note of what was done this year by Keighley BNP, whose activists sold an amazing one hundred tickets to members and supporters, bringing so many people

Editor of Freedom, Martin Wingfield, by the publications tent

another magical performance

(including nearly sixty children) that they organised a full-sized hog roast just to feed their own section of the campsite on Saturday evening. On top of this, they also put on a fascinating display on their stall, including historic photos and artefacts illustrating their town's heritage, and craft items made by local members, including a perfect miniaturised replica of a West Ridings dry stone wall.

Other branches all over Britain are urged to get the RWB 2005 DVDs as soon as they are released, to show them at special fund-raising social evenings, and to start making plans to match or outdo Keighley next year, both in terms of attendance and ambition. See you all there!

Jihad: Islam's 1,300-Year War on Europe & Europeans

» It is no coincidence that the successful suicide bombers of 7/7, and the would-be suicide bombers of 21/7, were Muslim extremists, says Arthur Kemp, author of this historical review. The London bombings, while directly prompted by Tony Blair's illegal and immoral invasion of Iraq, form an integral part of extreme Islam's war against Europe, which has been raging for the past 1,300 years.

» The very word 'Islam' means 'submission' in Arabic and the violent history of that religion leaves no doubt as to why it has come to be called by that name, drenched as it is in the blood of countless hundreds of thousands of Europeans.

Islam: Born in Conflict

Islam's founder, Muhammad, claimed in 610 AD to have received a message from Allah to start that religion. In 617 he began to preach in the city of Mecca, but was not well received. A popular revolt against his teachings forced Muhammad to flee for his life in 622.

He found refuge in the rival city of Medina, where his message found more fertile ground. Soon he had a fairly large following and, within the year, Muhammad issued Islam's very first "holy war" order - the Jihad - against Mecca. Using his status as founder of that religion, Muhammad created the precedent still used today of justifying violent conquest in the name of Islam, by claiming that it was Allah's will.

An eight year-long war then erupted between Medina and Mecca, which ended with Muhammad's forces being victorious. Muhammad became ruler of Mecca and Medina in 630. The first Islamic state had been founded, born out of war, violence, bloodshed and aggressive conquest.

Muhammad saw that it was easier to spread his religion through violent coercion rather than preaching, and in two years his Muslim armies had, through open warfare, seized the majority of the Arabian Peninsula, and had forcibly converted it to Islam.

Islam's Continued Violent Expansion

Muhammad died in 632. His succ-

Muslims celebrate the fall of a Spanish town after the successful Islamic invasion of Iberia in 711 AD. Note the white girls being taken into slavery: The Muslims demanded - and received - a yearly tribute of young White girls for use in their harems. This annual tribute continued until 791 when the Spanish had recovered their strength enough to break the terms of the treaty with the Muslims.

essors continued with the policy of violently expanding the reach of Islam: Syria was conquered in 636; Jerusalem and Persia were conquered in 637; and, in 641, the by now thoroughly blood-soaked Muslim army captured Alexandria, and started forcing Islam on the inhabitants of what is today Egypt.

Sweeping through North Africa, the Muslim armies took Tunisia in 698. By 709, their army stood at the Straits of Gibraltar, with only the fortress of Ceuta, situated on the African side of the strait, still in Spanish hands.

Islam Violently Attacks Mainland Europe

Two years of ferocious assaults by the Muslims by now called 'Moors' led to the fall of Ceuta in 711. The Moors then seized a beachhead on Andalusia in Spain, their first territory on the European mainland.

The Spanish King Roderic rushed an army south and engaged the Moors in a three day battle at Xeres. The Spanish were defeated, and, within a few months, the Muslims had violently seized most of Spain and Portugal, putting to death untold tens of thousands of Europeans.

The Tribute of 100 White Virgins per Year

The subjugated Spanish were subjected to the full horror of Muslim rule, as exemplified in the '100 virgins per year' treaty they were forced to sign. In terms of this treaty, the Spaniards had to hand over 100 White virgins a year to the Muslims for use in their harems - a painful tribute which continued until 791, when the treaty was broken.

The Islamic Jihad against Europe

continued: in 722, the Muslim armies crossed the Pyrenees and invaded France, seizing several towns. In 732, they launched a massive assault, under the command of the Moorish governor of Spain, Abd arRahman, on central France. Huge regions were utterly laid waste, with the inhabitants being forced to convert to Islam or be executed on the spot.

Charles Martel Defeats Muslim Invasion

The Paris-based king of the Franks, Charles Martel, mobilised a counter attack against the Muslim invasion. Charles met Abd arRahman in battle between the towns of Tours and Poitiers, in October 732. The future of Europe hinged on the battle: defeat for the Europeans would have seen all of Western Europe fall under the sway of Islam. An epic seven-day battle followed. In the first six days of the battle, the archers and cavalry of the Moors seemed to have the advantage, but on the seventh day, the main body of fighting closed to hand-to-hand combat. Here the greater physical stature of the Franks counted for more - with the Frankish King Charles, earning the name Martel ("hammer") at this battle in recognition of the mighty and fatal strokes with which he personally killed dozens, if not hundreds, of Moors.

The Muslims fled south, suffering the first reverse in their plans of violent conquest. The Franks followed up with an attack against the town of Narbonne in 755, and six years later, after much fighting and bloodletting, the last of the Muslims were driven from all of France.

The European Reconquest of Spain

The Muslims still held the Iberian Peninsula. In 778, Charlemagne, Charles Martel's grandson, launched an invasion into northern Spain which recaptured much of the territory north of the Ebro River from the control of Islam. The European counter-attack had started.

Slowly but surely, small parts of northern Spain were liberated from the harsh Muslim rule by local princes. In July 1212, the Muslims were defeated at the Battle of Toledo, but in December 1482, they seized the town of Zahara, only 15 miles from Seville.

The Ten Years' War: Islamic Invaders Expelled from Spain

The Muslim attack on Zahara sparked the Ten Years' War: under the combined leadership of Queen Isabella I and her husband, Ferdinand V, the Spaniards counterattacked.

In 1482, the European armies seized Alhama from the Muslims. Between 1483 and 1486, the Spanish drove the Muslims out of the western half of the kingdom of Granada. With the capture of the city of Malaga in 1487, followed in quick succession by the fall of the towns of Baza, Almeria and Gaudix in campaigns during 1488 to 1489, the Europeans closed in on the last Muslim stronghold - the citadel of Grenada. The siege of Grenada lasted from July 1491 to January 1492. Finally, the Muslims were forced to surrender, and they and their religion were expelled from Spain. Islam's 781-year long attempt to violently seize Western Europe had failed.

Islam Attacks Italy: The Hill of the Martyrs

Setbacks in Spain did not deter Islam's desire to conquer other parts of mainland Europe. In 1479, under the leadership of Mohammed II, the Muslims attacked the island of Rhodes off Greece, only being repulsed by a European defence force under the Knights of St. John. Undeterred, Mohammed II then invaded Italy itself, seizing the city of Otranto in the Kingdom of Naples. Of the 22,000 inhabitants captured by the Muslims, 12,000 were bound with ropes and tortured to death outside the city walls. The Muslims also killed all the Christian priests they could find. On a hill outside the city, still known as Martyr's Hill, they killed many captives who refused to convert to Islam.

Islam Attacks South Eastern Europe

In 717 AD, the Muslims under Caliph Velid launched a furious attack upon the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire, Constantinople. Through feats of incredible bravery, the Europeans managed to hold on to the city fortress. A new Muslim attack was planned: Led by Osman, a new Muslim army was formed. The followers of Osman became known as Osmanlilar ("those associated with Osman"), or, as they became known in the West, the Ottomans.

By 1330, the Muslim Ottomans had fought their way to the Aegean Sea,

In 732 AD, the Muslims launched a massive invasion of present day France. The king of the Franks, Charles Martel, counter-attacked. The European army was utterly victorious, and Charles Martel earned his name at this battle: Martel means "hammer" - he personally bludgeoned to death a large number of the enemy army with his favourite weapon, a mighty hammer.

The fall of the Eastern Roman Empire. On 28 May 1453, the Muslims began their final assault on the city of Constantinople with an army in the hundreds of thousands. The city was defended by only some 7,000 White knights drawn from all over Europe. After a furious all night battle, the walls of the city were finally breached at dawn the next day. All the Whites in the city were massacred or sold into slavery. Constantinople was made into a major Muslim centre and renamed Istanbul.

and in that year the first Islamic army stood at the Bosphorus Straits, directly opposite Constantinople. In 1354, they attacked and plundered the city of Gallipoli, and poured troops into mainland South Eastern Europe.

Marching into the Balkans, the Muslims defeated a Bulgarian army and then advanced into Serbia, defeating that country's army at the battle of Kosovo in 1389. During that battle, a Serbian soldier killed the Ottoman leader, Murad. After the battle was over, the Muslims cruelly tortured and executed the captured Serbian prince, Lazar, as a reprisal.

Muslim Army Advances into Central Europe

A combined European army attempted to halt the Islamic invasion in 1396, where they met the Muslim tyrants at the Battle of Nicopolis on the Danube River. The Europeans were defeated, and the Muslims celebrated their victory by executing the thousands of European prisoners they had taken during the battle, in a bloodthirsty massacre lasting several hours.

In 1439, Serbia was formally annexed to the Muslim empire and in 1440 Belgrade was besieged. In 1444, another attempt by the Europeans to defeat the Islamic army ended in failure at the Battle of Varna in Bulgaria.

The Janissaries: White Children Abducted by the Invading Muslims

issued an edict to the conquered Europeans in the Balkans that they had to hand over to the Ottomans 1,000 White male babies "with faces white and shining" each and every year. These abducted children were raised as Muslims, and were compelled to serve the Ottomans, with their origins being concealed from them. They became the best armed unit within the Ottoman Empire, known as the Janissaries. This annual tribute continued for 300 years until 1648, and the Janissaries were only disbanded in 1826, after they rebelled against their masters.

Constantinople Falls to Islam: Renamed Istanbul

The city of Constantinople had managed to hold grimly on through all these Muslim advances: far behind the Muslim front line, the city grew weaker and weaker. Finally, in 1453, the Muslim army launched a mighty effort to break the city. After bombarding the city walls with cannon fire for months, a determined overnight attack saw the city fall at last - the official end of the Eastern Roman Empire, defended only by 7,000 knights from all over Europe against a Muslim army numbering in the hundreds of thousands.

The Venetian ship's doctor, Niccolo Barbaro, who was at the battle, recorded the terrible revenge exacted upon the remaining Europeans: "The Turks put the city to sword as they came, and everyone they found in their way they slashed with their scimitars, women and men, old and young, of every condition, and this slaughter continued from dawn until midday. They sought out the convents and all the nuns were taken to the ships and abused and dishonored by the Turks, and they were all sold at auction as slaves to be taken to Turkey, and similarly the young women were all dishonored and sold at auction; some preferred to throw themselves into wells and drown. These Turks loaded their ships with people and a great treasure. They had this custom: when they entered a house, they would at once raise a flag with their own device, and when other Turks saw such a flag raised, no other Turk would for the world enter that house but would go looking for a house that had no flag; it was the same with all the convents and churches. Blood flowed on the ground as though it were raining." (Chronicles of the Crusades: Eyewitness Accounts of the wars between Christianity and Islam, Ed. E. Hallam, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, London, 1989).

The Muslims Advance to Vienna

Spurred on by the fall of Constantinople, the Muslims then seized all of Greece, Albania and Bosnia. A plan to invade Italy was only aborted after the Ottoman emperor of the time died halfway through the planning of the invasion.

The Islamic army attempted to take Belgrade in 1456, but was defeated by the Hungarian national hero, Janos Hunyadi. Undeterred, the Muslims finally took Belgrade in 1521, having earlier seized both Bosnia and Herzegovina. In 1522, the Muslims captured the island of Rhodes, and in 1526 the Muslims defeated a Hungarian army at the battle of Mohacs, where the Hungarian king and more than 20,000 European soldiers were killed.

Budapest fell to a Muslim assault in 1526, and by 1529 the Islamic invaders stood at the gates of Vienna. There they were turned back, but the defeat was only temporary. In 1571 the Muslims seized the island of Cyprus and in 1661, captured much of present day Ukraine. In 1669 they conquered the island of Crete. By 1683, the Muslim army stood once again at the entrance to Vienna.

Muslims Defeated at Vienna: Origin of the Croissant

Soldiers from all over Europe flocked to the defence of Vienna. This great battle, fought in 1683, saw the Muslim invaders defeated, with the death blow being delivered by the arrival of a Polish army which attacked them on the flank. The Muslims fled in disarray.

The Europeans held a victory feast and the chefs made bread in the shape of the Muslim Ottoman flag - the crescent moon - so that the victors could physically eat the enemy's emblem. This is the origin of the curved bread called the croissant, still a popular meal to this day.

European Counter Attack: Islam Driven Out of S. E. Europe

In 1697 Prince Eugene of Savoy defeated a huge Muslim army at Senta in northern Serbia, forcing them to sue for peace. The Treaty of Karlowitz saw the Muslims give up substantial parts of Eastern Europe, including the city of Belgrade.

In 1731, the Russians attempted to take back the lands the Muslims had seized: this venture ended in a Russian defeat at the Battle of Prut River. The Muslims then attacked again in the Balkans, retaking Belgrade in 1739. By threatening Vienna once again, they were able to negotiate a peace treaty from the European powers which allowed them to keep much of their now reconquered lands in the Balkans. The Russians waited another three years before relaunching their assault on the Muslims: in 1744, a surprise attack saw the Ottomans in Rumania defeated.

After 345 years of Islamic subjugation, the Serbs launched a nine-year long revolt in 1804 but were suppressed by their Muslim masters in a brutal campaign in 1813. Undeterred, the brave Serbs launched yet another attempt to eject the Muslims in 1815 and this time were successful - within a few months most of Serbia was cleared of Turks.

Greece became independent in 1829 after launching military campaigns against the Muslims, backed with material support from both Britain and Russia.

In 1876, a rebellion in Bulgaria saw tens of thousands of Europeans slain by the Muslims in what became known as the Bulgarian Atrocities.

Russians Drive Islamic Invaders Back to Constantinople

The Russians went to war against the Muslims again in 1877. In a swift campaign, they drove the Islamic armies back to Istanbul (Constantinople) and forced them to sign the Treaty of San Stefano of 1878, which stripped them of most of their European territories, including Bulgaria, Macedonia and Thrace. Britain gained possession of Cyprus. Tunisia was taken by the French in 1881, and Egypt was taken by the British in 1882. By 1911, the Muslims had also lost control of the North African port of Tripoli to the Italians.

World War One offered the Ottoman Empire a temporary reprieve. Seizing an offer extended by Germany and the Austro-Hungarian Empire to form an alliance, the Ottomans provided a diversion to British and French forces in the Middle East, in return for which the Germans supplied modern munitions and weapons. The War ended with the Ottomans losing most of the Middle Eastern possessions to the British - including Iraq and Palestine - and the final dissolution of that Muslim Empire by the secular rebellion within Turkey led by Kemal Attaturk.

Mass Immigration: The Modern Muslim Invasion

Europe, having fought off an overtly violent invasion from the Muslim world, has, since the end of the Second World War, made the critical error of allowing mass Third World immigration. In this population shift, Islam has once again featured, to the point where Muslims now constitute the single largest element of all immigration blocks in most of Western Europe. The Jihad has been reconstituted: only this time, instead of arriving to the sound of swords and fire, Islam has arrived on passports, via the airport and harbours, courtesy of successive left-wing governments, both Tory and Labour.

Now that they are established in Europe, these communities are being radicalised and are spawning extremists who are continuing the tradition set out by their forefathers.

The Muslim extremist who ritually murdered Dutch film maker, Theo Van Gogh in November 2004, was a second generation immigrant in Holland. The 9-11 attackers in the US used Muslims legally resident in Hamburg, Germany, as a logistical support channel. The Madrid train bombings were carried out by Moroccan Muslims legally resident in Spain. The London Bombers too were 'home-grown'. And so the list goes on: everywhere where there has been Third World immigration there has been increased Muslim-based radicalization.

There is no middle road. Europe will both confront and defeat Islam's new attempt at conquest, or it will be overwhelmed and Islamified. History shows that this is Islam's ultimate goal. Will our generation have the mettle of our ancestors who successfully resisted the previous attempt by Islam to seize our lands?

The Muslims are defeated at the gates of Vienna in a historic battle for the soul of Europe, fought in 1683. Heroic resistance by European armies, drawn from all over the continent, contributed to the Islamic defeat, with the decisive blow being delivered by a Polish army.

Politico's Guide to Election Practice and Law, by Susan Child

» Book Review by Eddy Butler

» It is well past the time when local organisers and activists should be taking elections seriously. Knowledge of election law is fundamental to this. Now that this book is available from Excalibur, any Regional Organiser (or where appointed Regional Elections Officer) who does not have ready access to this book (and is therefore not reliant upon ringing up someone more efficient than themselves) is not worthy of holding down their post. Any Branch Organiser who is at all serious about their active involvement in politics should have a copy of this book. Any activist who has any sort of ambition to get on and help our party to achieve political success should have a copy of this book.

How many will we sell? Hmmm, I'll check up with Excalibur in a couple of months.

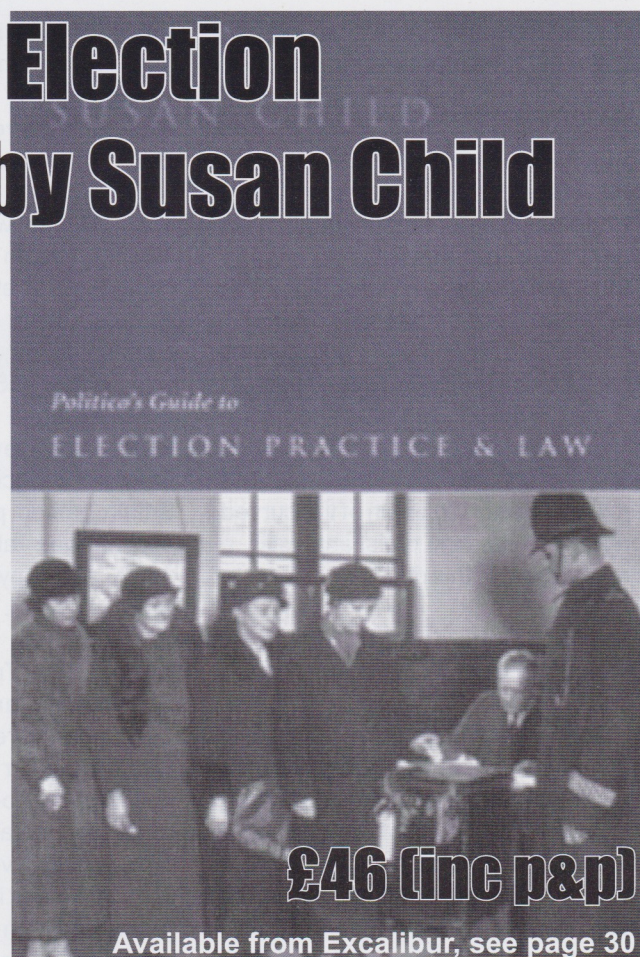

Some of the chapters will not be of immediate use to you. For example, the opening chapter deals with the internal candidate selection procedures adopted by the various parties that have representation in Westminster, the Scottish, Welsh, Northern Irish and Greater London Assemblies or the European Parliament (not us, in other words, yet). It is however interesting to see how they select their candidates and will be a basis for us to implement more effective processes the closer we get to gaining representation at these levels.

There are also separate chapters dealing with the slightly different legal electoral procedures in place for the various Assemblies.

That is because this book is comprehensive. It deals with virtually everything that a local officer involved in election work will need to know. From how to fill out the Nomination Papers, to the role of the Agent, to the qualifications required to be a candidate, to Election expenses. How do you challenge an election result? What offences relate to elections and what are the possible punishments? Other important areas are the timetabling of elections. When do local elections occur? What timetable applies to local by-elections? How do you call a local by-elections? What about Town or Parish council elections - or Town or Parish Council by-elections?

In my experience, one of the least known areas of election law that this book clears up surrounds election timetables. The cycle of when local elections take place and the specific timetable governing when the nomination forms have to be handed in. Also the vital area of when and how you can call a local by-election.

Other very important information contained within this book relates to the duties and responsibilities of your local Returning Officer or Acting Returning Officer (it is very useful to know this). The book also contains copies of all the relevant forms that you will need to complete as part of the electoral process. There is also a useful chapter on the role of the Electoral Commission and another on different voting systems.

The book clears up one arcane aspect of law which had long been the cause of internal strife and disagreement. I had, through many an argument, contended that the only legislation that positively required the display of a printed and published address (except for periodical journals) was the Representation of the Peoples Act 1983, and that accordingly, a printed and published address was not necessary for leaflets that were distributed outside an election, and that the only reason people put the p&p address on non-electoral leaflets was out of a shadowy belief in some mythical ancient legislation that said it must be so!

As a matter of course we always put a printed and published address on all leaflets in case they are also distributed during an election although there are other rules which impact on whether general purpose party literature counts as election literature (read the book to find out). Anyway, I now know that the Newspapers, Printers and Reading Room Act 1869 still applies, and any printed matter distributed to the public must bear the mark of the printer and publisher!

While this book should be on the shelf of every serious local officer, be advised that it is not bed-time reading for most people, although the author makes a few attempts at humour. Susan Child admits to having been a candidate of the Social Democratic Party in the 1980s, and makes a few politically correct jokes by freely quoting from an earlier election 'bible' from the 1920s.

We have been amateur for too long. Do not rely on the inadequate Candidate's Guides handed out for free by local councils. Do not rely on searching the internet for extra information and often coming up with a wrong or misleading answer! Get professional and get this book.

British National Lottery: Trafalgar Bicentennial Draw

LAST CHANCE TO GET YOUR TICKETS

This draw commemorates a very special anniversary and has a very special related top prize; a limited edition stool made from oak taken from Lord Nelson's HMS Victory - when the ship was put into dry dock in 1928- for the Trafalgar Bicentennial Draw. Only 200 of these stools have been produced and its value as a collector's item is expected to rise in the years to come - it is already worth nearly £1000. It is inscribed with Nelson, 1805, Victory, 2005 (one on each side) has a brass plate verifying its origins.

The draw date is September the 24th and tickets are available now. Members automatically received a book of ten in their July British Nationalist but extra copies can be ordered by calling 01463 793 298 or e-mailing bnl@bnp.org.uk (UK resident non-members may also order quantities in the same way).

Please support the BNL draws by selling tickets to friends, family and work colleagues. Remember we are selling an idea not just a lottery ticket! Any group or person who sells 1,000 tickets will get 10% back for their local BNP group after the draw has been completed.

Playing to win our Nation Back

John Bean's Nationalist Notebook

Don't Feel Sorry For the PC Police Chief

One could almost feel sorry for Sir Ian Blair, head of the Metropolitan Police, in having to carry the can for the killing of the innocent Brazilian at Stockwell tube station; particularly as many of us feel we must support the police in the fight against home grown terrorists. However, he must obviously share the blame with Gold Commander Cressida Dick, a lady 'top cop' originally parachuted in from Oxford University.

Referred to by the ordinary police officers as "Commander PC", he is not regarded as a hunter of villains in the way that Sir John Stevens his predecessor was. The manner in which he tried to hang four officers out to dry on a charge of racial discrimination has not been forgiven. It was part of his priority given to make the Met multi-cultural, with a target of 25 per cent ethnic minorities by 2009 and which entails stopping all recruitment of white officers for the next three years. His next main concern appears to have been the refurbishing of his office, at a cost of £200,000, when he took up his post as Chief Commissioner.

According to a report in the Sunday Telegraph, 21.08.05, many police officers look at his career and dismiss it as "mostly management consultancy". "He hasn't done any real policing in decades," says one Met officer. "He just talks about how the police need to be more 'inclusive' - but what would he know about it? The last time he was on the streets going after criminals was so long ago he must have forgotten what it is like. He's got as far as he has because he kisses up New Labour - they love his style. But where's the substance?"

Sir Ian Blair must go because his political correctness has crippled the efficiency of the Metropolitan Police. Cressida Dick must go because her inept handling of the hunt for the July 21st London bombers led to the death of an innocent man.

Subsidising Those Who Would Kill Us

One of the most astounding outcomes of the Islamic terrorist attacks in Britain is the revelation that almost without exception the perpetrators had no record of gainful employment but lived on social security payments. In other words, we the taxpayers were financing those whose objective here was to kill us.

The same can be said for nearly every one of the extremist Muslim clerics in our midst who have been spewing out their hatred of all things British, of all things Christian, and thereby encouraging the young men who turned those words of hate into terrorist acts. The classic example - and by no means an isolated case - is Omar Bakri Mohammed, who fled to Lebanon and at the time of writing has announced that he wishes to return to London for a heart operation on our NHS. It is certainly not his NHS for he has not paid one penny into National Health contributions since he first came to Britain twenty years ago.

Bakri has been receiving £331.28 a month in incapacity benefit and £183.30 a month in disability living allowance because of a teenage leg injury. Both payments are being continued for at least six months as long as he intends to return, as will the housing benefit on his home in Edmonton, north London, and his council tax benefit. His wife, who remains in Britain with their seven children, can also continue to claim a benefits package thought to be worth at least £1,300 a month. Bakri drives a Toyota people carrier worth £30,000, paid for under a scheme called Motability.

Without doing a hand's turn to earn one penny, this Muslim fanatic has been receiving more than the average British wage earner and far more than the overwhelming majority of pensioners who have contributed to National Insurance contributions for 50 years or more. But we still say that any hatred in readers' hearts should not be directed at Bakri and his ilk but at those old party politicians who have allowed this every increasing drain on our resources which, unless stopped, could also be a factor in contributing to the likelihood of civil war in this country.

I feel that if the British people continue to turn the other cheek at this misapplication of our money by the old gang parties and do not back the BNP in its struggle to save our nation, then they deserve what's coming to them. It would be easy to say, I am not bothered because I will have gone. But my grandchildren will still be here. It is for them that I continue fighting.

Commonsense From India

Anyone who has lived in India (I did for one period, although only for three months) will know that we can sometimes accuse Indian writers of verbosity, but seldom of hypocrisy. This came to mind when reading a report on the Muslim terrorist attacks in London written by T.V.R. Shenoy in the English language Indian Express of 18.08.05. Mr Shenoy set an example for journalistic standards which have been destroyed by political correctness amongst most of our own British journalists. Here are some examples of what he considered to be a factual comment on post 7/7 Britain.

"There was no visible backlash against the Muslim community in Britain immediately after the London blasts. Some commentators went so far as to mouth the usual politically correct spiel about how poverty and poor education were at the root of misguided youth adopting terrorism. But I am not sure how much more the British can stomach of being denounced as 'kafir' by men who are living on the dole.

"Some Britons are more open about their likes and dislikes. 'Maybe now it's time to start listening to the BNP,' says the headline next to a photo from the scene of the London blasts. It is a leaflet released by the British National Party for a council by-election in Barking. In case some one had not got the message, party leader Nick Griffin was quite explicit: "The Labour Party for years has allowed Islamic extremists to preach in mosques in Britain and use them to recruit people to their cause. It is the Labour Party that is to blame." Griffin is already facing charges of spreading race hatred but everyone is afraid that he is simply articulating aloud what many Britons believe silently.

"However, there is a crucial difference between the Nick Griffins of the world and the likes of Sheikh Omar Bakri Mohammed. The British National Party is not conducting classes for budding terrorists, nor is it applauding the London Bombers as 'the Fantastic Four'. Which leads ordinary Britons to wonder why it is Griffin who is being prosecuted by the government while the Syrian preacher could draw an allowance from the same authorities. There is no answer to that question". Well said, Mr Shenoy. We could not have put it better. Multi-racial Myths Identity has been in the forefront of those publications exposing the obsession of the BBC in promoting modern Britain as both multiracial and multi-cultural. Hopefully, this nation is still 90 per cent white, so the day when we are truly multi-racial, i.e 50 per cent of the population being of non-European origin, is still probably 40 years off. The acts of terrorism by non-whites of the Islamic faith have blown the happy concept of multi-culturalism completely out of the water as far as most Britons are concerned, and who are now coming round to seeing the good sense of the BNP slogan "Freedom and Security NOT Diversity and Danger".

In spite of what has happened, the BBC Commissars and also the International Capitalist Advertisers of ITV and Channel 4, still seem determined to put over their dislike of whiteness, Englishness, traditional Scottish and Welsh values (but not Irish for the present) and Christianity itself. BBC programmes such as EastEnders and Casualty have far more than 10 per cent ethnic minority characters, with ITV's Coronation Street coming up fast in the multi-racial stakes. At least one third of newsreaders are from the ethnic minorities, including local newsreaders and reporters in areas such as Cornwall and East Anglia where less than two per cent of the population is non-European. Some are quite competent at their job, with Trevor McDonald still setting an impeccable example, but others have obviously been chosen just because they are non-white.

We have mentioned the many multi-racial and multi-cultural adverts now to be seen on TV and, slightly less so, in the printed media. However it is in promotional material from big business, with BT and the main banks leading the way, that you will now find at least 50 per cent of the photographs being of ethnic 'minority' people. If enough of us wrote to the companies marketing directors politely objecting to this untruthful portrayal of our population and they thought they might start losing business, perhaps it would have an effect.

However there is little effect we can have on Hollywood films. One of its latest offerings follows in the genre of Independence Day, where the US top brass calls upon a black pilot to save the world from aliens. In Stealth it goes one better, with the US Navy hand-picking an elite squad of fighter pilots "to destroy the enemy wherever they may exist in the world". The top three chosen are one black, one white, and one girl (white, with nice teeth and a wonderful figure). Now in the real world, if any of the US Air Force's women pilots were crack fighter aces, then do you not think that they would have been well publicised doing their stuff over Baghdad? The same goes for black pilots, who are as rare as crocuses on municipal dust tips. What is more, do such film makers every consider the damage they are doing to black youth by giving them false expectations? When they are frequently depicted as ace pilots and brain surgeons and find that in reality they fail to reach these objectives, then they think it is just a plot by the honkies to stop them reaching their potential.

Wages Stagnate Under US Trade Deficit

As the Soviet Union's economic system slowly disintegrated, rigid Marxist thinking prevented them from trying other financial and trading methods. The result, of course, was the total collapse of the Communist block in 1989-90. Now America, and Britain to a more delayed extent, faces a similar problem with their inability, or lack of concern, to tackle the escalating trade deficit. This is because, much like the old Soviet leaders, the American and British establishments are enthralled by utopian concepts: in the West's case the market orthodoxy of free trade globalisation.

A good summary of the economic debacle America is sliding into, with us tagging along behind, appeared in an article by William Greider, "America's Truth Deficit", published in the New York Times July 18, 2005. He states that for years, elite opinion dismissed the buildup of foreign indebtedness as a trivial issue. Now that it is too large to deny, they concede the trend is "unsustainable". That's an economist's euphemism for 'things cannot go on like this, not without ugly consequences for American living standards'. One of the outcomes is that wave after wave of jobs have moved overseas (sounds familiar to a growing number of British employees?), with the result that there has been a 30-year stagnation of working-class wages in America, while the rich have got richer.

LETTER OF THE MONTH

>> Global Capitalism at Heathrow

Nationalists are against international capitalism. They point to the twin evils of imported labour and exported jobs; practices that harm the workforce of any country. Foreign workers are cheaper to employ and easier to fire. The recent strike at London Airport was about imported Asian workers being sacked so that the American employer could hire even cheaper East Europeans. This kind of capitalism has no morals or national affiliations; it is driven only by profit and can only be contained by legislation. If international agreements were torn up slavery would be reintroduced immediately.

But foreign investment is not always negative. The Japanese motor companies operating in the UK provide employment in their car plants, in the factories of sub-contractors and in the dealerships. Taxes are paid on the profits and money is reinvested in research and development. Capital is sent to Japan but their industry in the UK is to our advantage. The Japanese have built their plants here to access the European market and because Britons are very good at making cars. If Rover had enjoyed the same investment we might still have a British motor industry. Like all aspects of life there are good and bad capitalists. It is the responsibility of governments and trade unions to protect wages and conditions. A blanket ban on foreign ownership of industry would only damage our economy.

>> Islamic Preachers

Home Secretary Charles Clarke has revealed plans to muzzle extreme Islamic clerics from preaching sermons of hate. It is difficult to understand how he hopes to achieve this.

The believers (of Islam) live by and preach from the Koran. It rules their lives. It also incites believers to make war on the infidels (Christians) who dwell around them, paragraphs 9:73 and 9:121, to name but two.

Charles Clarke has confirmed by letter to me that the Koran will not be banned under the proposed Incitement to Religious Hatred Law. Therefore extreme, and moderate, Islamic clerics will legally continue to preach from the Koran, including its incitement to religious hatred and violence against 'infidels'. Therefore Islamic clerics will not be muzzled. British citizens will be muzzled. Racial equality? Forgive my sardonic laugh!

>> BNP's Social Conscience

Those of us who oppose non-white immigration are generally called right-wing or extreme right. We call ourselves nationalists and our militant enemies call us fascists, but that's just political abuse.

The old 1960's BNP was as 'left' as it was 'right'. We advocated public-private initiative and European co-operation forty years before it became government policy. Then came the NF, originally led by A.K. Chesterton, a dedicated campaigner against globalism and the new aristocracy of moneylenders and entertainers.

Nationalists have always had a social conscience and it's good to see that the BNP's new manifesto upholds this tradition.

>> Genetic Differences

I too read the Peter Hitchens article in the Mail on Sunday in which he said there are no racial differences, and which was referred to by Joe Priestly in 'ID' June. I e-mailed Mr Hitchens to point out that there are indeed a number of genetic differences between the races. Surprisingly, Mr Hitchens replied, begrudgingly, saying: "OK, I should have said no important differences"! Quite a climb down from his original stance.

So, as our Editor wrote recently in his 'Nationalist Notebook', it certainly does pay to write to the press, both local and national. Keep them short, polite and to the point. Don't fret if it is not published, someone has read it and now knows your views. The more letters received in a similar vein the more chance of success. So get writing now!

>> Apologists For Terrorism

I am disgusted by the apologists for the Islamic terrorists who attacked our capital city and murdered scores of people in the London underground. We had teachers almost in tears as they described one of the murderers as a lovely person who loved kids. Also describing another cowardly terrorist as a typical lad who loved cricket. I find all this very offensive. I also find it offensive that 99.9% of British Muslims have been described as 'lovely law abiding' people by Tony Blair, Sir Ian Blair and numerous others of that ilk.

I would never describe my own indigenous population in that way. I would say about 60% of white Christians are good people, in contrast to the Muslims who, according to the Blairs, are almost perfect.

>> Sophistry From The Old Gang

Sophistry has become endemic with the Labour Government, the Tory opposition and the Liberal Democrats. The clever use of arguments which seem true but are really false, in order to deceive people, is now widespread within all the three main parties.

The British National Party offers a fourth way, a transparent, truthful and honest manifesto for the British people, and it will continue to grow and flourish under its current leadership and structure.

Far from capitalising on recent events, the BNP has been exonerated from being a vehicle for "scaremongering" to being recognised as the only party in Britain to speak out against the folly, danger and downright stupidity of becoming embroiled in a war where over 25,000 Iraqi men, women and children have lost their lives for no British interests whatsoever.

Keep Britain out of foreign wars and keep foreign wars out of Britain.

>> Hoodies or Officialdom

A few weeks ago a number of newspapers reported that a 15-year-old girl was stabbed in her classroom by another female pupil. The previous year's Ofsted inspection had found the schools management and leadership had "serious weaknesses" and pupils' attitudes and behaviour "as a serious problem".

Referring to the incident, school head Jonathan Block described the attack "as a one off incident" before proudly adding... the pupils are "well behaved and well disciplined....".

Perhaps it was these "well behaved and well disciplined" children who beat senseless and hospitalised poor 71-year-old Harry Woods on the same evening. Or the 20 or so of them smashing the wing mirrors on the cars in our street. A supposedly genteel, respectable and 'sought after area', according to the pot-bellied local estate agent.

Turning the page I see over-zealous Epping council has issued Eileen Davies, 72, with an ASBO for feeding birds in her own garden. Poor Eileen obviously was dreaming of 'merrie' England in her little sanctuary away from the hoodies. But don't worry Eileen, if the hoodies don't get you officialdom will. It seems the council and police have plenty of time to harass 72-year-old pensioners but not an ounce of time to catch these hoodies who terrorise our streets.

Finally how lucky for our 15-year-old stab victim that the nurses at her local hospital decided to remain at their posts and ignore the latest health promotion directive to spend their time walking around hospital doing hour-long 'ciggie patrols'.

I hope poor Ethel has enough milk for her tea this evening as I see that gang of "well behaved and well disciplined" hoodies has congregated outside the local Co-Op again. Now was there not a law passed a year or so ago that banned the congregation of youths in groups of more than two? Still at least whilst there taking turns to photograph the hospitalisation of poor Ethel it will keep them away from my car tonight.

>> Enoch Forsaw Racial Civil War

In the Daily Mail of 18th July there was an article warning us of a possible racial civil war stemming from young British-born Pakistanis in Leeds, and that the 7/7 massacre was a step on the road to such a civil war. The author concluded that: "In Leeds - as we must suppose in many other cauldron towns and cities - the great multi-cultural experiment appears to be failing disastrously." The writer said that "no one could have envisaged" this unexpected outcome of the multi-racial fantasy.

However, rather than face what they have done our 'elites' are making scapegoats of us who have persistently opposed this. Notably it was the late Enoch Powell who in 1971 said:

"...It is when he looks into the eyes of Asia, that the Englishman comes face to face with those whom he will fight for the possession of his native land."

In publishing this letter we would stress that the BNP's objective is to prevent such a racial conflict in Britain occurring. - Editor

>> Why Import Problems?

Some 32% of British Muslims think that Western Society is decadent, immoral, and should be brought to an end (YouGov, Daily Telegraph 23rd July). Is this the thanks we get for our open doors policy? Surely these dissidents would be better served in their countries of ethnic origin, where they would find it more difficult to generate problems for the indigenous people of Britain?

We have enough problems at home; we do not need to import them. Why are we embroiled in wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, where no British interests are involved? Why are our armed servicemen being prosecuted by the very people who should vigorously support them? Why is an innocent foreign national gunned down by police in London?

The prescient Enoch Powell had it right. His rivers of blood have begun to flow. The policies of successive British governments have signally failed to protect and promote the real interests of the British people.

Their disastrous policy of so-called multiculturalism has failed dismally, and its proponents must surely be held to account. We have had enough of political correctness and the impossible wish to be all things to all people. The time is overdue to place true Britons first, and to reverse our current national death-wish.

Home-Schooling: Creating True Alternatives

» Troy Southgate says we must reject the System and make the education of our own youth under our own control a priority

» "Men had better be without education than be educated by their rulers; for this education is but the mere breaking in of the steer to the yoke; the mere discipline of the hunting dog, which by dint of severity is made to forego the strongest impulse of his nature, and instead of devouring his prey, to hasten with it to the feet of his master." - Thomas Hodgkins

» "He that will not apply new remedies must expect new evils." - Roger Bacon

» One of the main reasons people choose to become involved in political activity is due to a growing concern for the kind of world our children will be forced to inherit in the future.

As opponents of liberalism and political correctness we would all like to see a fresh generation of youngsters become instilled with our own healthy values, but for a System which allows its moral and intellectual standards to be fixed by the mass society - so that individuality and non-participation are discouraged - this becomes a rather subversive demand. Are we fighting a losing battle or can we somehow ensure that our message of political, social and economic decentralisation is passed on to the youth of tomorrow?

It is my view that our political and economic objectives must be preceded by a Spiritual Revolution which begins in the hearts and minds of individuals and then spreads by example. If we cannot change ourselves, then we cannot ever expect to encourage others to share our worldview and thus help build alternatives to the present System.

Furthermore, if we do not set an example to our children then we will inevitably lose them to the prevailing anti-culture of television gameshows, abortion-on-demand, gangsta-rap, drug-addiction and conformist apathy. The only way that we can succeed, therefore, is by rejecting the System itself and making the education of our own youth a priority.

Ever since the second half of the nineteenth century and the gradual expansion of the proletariat, parents no longer have the task of educating their children and most are deposited into State-run or grant-maintained schools. But is it right that a mother who is opposed to wage-slavery and economic servitude should be thrust into the workplace whilst her children are indoctrinated by the very System she and her spouse vigorously oppose? Of course not.

Picture the scene as a fifteen year-old child is taught by her parents that mono-racialism is the only way to preserve the identity of all races and cultures. Before long, the same child is being informed by her teacher in the classroom that multi-racialism is a contributing factor towards the betterment of society as a whole and that she must write an essay on Nelson Mandela's A Long Walk To Freedom by next Tuesday.

Short of marching up to the school every two or three days to complain to the headmaster that a certain teacher is contradicting their beliefs, there is very little the child's parents can do in such a situation. The only alternative, therefore, is for parents to take their children out of school completely and educate them at home.

According to Mark Halstead, "there are two broad groups of home educators: those with a philosophy and those with a problem." But whilst many children are constantly exposed to bullying and various other problems, we should be primarily interested in how our children are developing ideologically. The gradual decline of academic standards in modern society, is another reason why many parents are exploring the option of home-schooling as a means of securing a sound education for their children. This idea is becoming very popular amongst religious groups,

Rescue your children from the multi-cultural classroom particularly Pagan and Muslim parents who have come to realise that the safest way of ensuring that their children receive an education based around their respective traditional and ethnic values, is to teach them first-hand. Certain political groups are also actively involved in promoting the concept of home-schooling, and these range from Anarchist groups on the one hand, to Green and Marxist organisations on the other. We must ensure that nationalists with children also make full use of this vital option.

NOT A NEW CONCEPT

Home-schooling is certainly not a new concept. After all, before the advent of schools or educational systems it was considered perfectly natural for parents to educate and nurture their own children, with many of them viewing it as a sacred task. Nowadays, many parents are waking up to the fact that whilst people vary and have different needs, the National Curriculum merely demonstrates how a bureaucratic educational system is unable to cater for all tastes.

Indeed, the present Curriculum is heavily steeped in propaganda and those parents who believe in independence and creativity are becoming anxious for their children to have an opportunity to explore an alternative set of political or spiritual issues. It is also a fact that the less we depend upon the institutions of the State, the more freedom we can have over our own lives. The State only continues to prosper whilst people give it their verbal or practical allegiance. Once this comes to an end the State becomes irrelevant and can then be swept aside by the growing power of community.

The main organisation promoting home-schooling in England is Education Otherwise, which was formed by a small group of parents at Leamington Spa in Warwickshire at the beginning of 1977. The group soon evolved into an effective self-help organisation offering support, advice and information to families practising or contemplating home-based education as an alternative to mainstream schooling. It takes its name from Section 36 of the 1944 Education Act, which states that parents must be responsible for their children's "efficient full time education, suitable to his age, ability and aptitude, and to any special educational needs he may have either by regular attendance at school or otherwise".

Although education is legally compulsory in this country, schooling is not. However, if parents cannot satisfy the Local Education Authority that their child is receiving a satisfactory education they could face prosecution and a summons to the magistrate's court. But if parents can prove that their child is being given a suitable education they have a concrete defence. If children are taken out of school and 'deregistered', the authorities must give parents "reasonable time" to set up an education programme. After children have been withdrawn from school, the State's only requirement is that a Local Education Authority Officer visits your home on an annual basis to check that some form of education is actually taking place. The benefits of home schooling are endless, and children:

1. do not have to follow the National Curriculum.
2. do not have to take tests or exams.
3. do not have to have a timetable.
4. do not have to have a qualified tutor to teach them.
5. do not have to work during the usual school hours.
6. do not have to work any particular number of hours a week.

Education Otherwise also aims to offer an immediate service for its members, as well as to ensure that families have the freedom to make reasonable choices about the type of education best suited to them. The group has no source of funding apart from the subscriptions and donations drawn from its membership, which, by 1991 was estimated at over 2,000 families, groups and individuals; a figure which includes over 600 trained teachers.

In 1995, approximately 100 families a month joined Education Otherwise and one study now estimates that there are at least 12,000 families practising home-based education in England and Wales alone.

Everything else it does relies upon the dedication and commitment of volunteer members. There is a network containing over 70 voluntary co-ordinators spread around the country, many of whom provide their members with specialised assistance in particular areas of education. There are also regular seminars and conferences, public meetings and children's workshops. In addition, the group provides its members with a full contact list containing the names, addresses and birthdates of all affiliates. This process serves as a useful method of pooling the organisation's resources and of informing families about the special requirements and categories which can be made available to them. In other words, this functions in much the same way as a cooperative, with skills and experience being shared internally for the benefit of all members.

Education Otherwise is keen to stress that it does not advocate a specific form of education for its members, but simply acts as a vehicle offering support and advice. Parents themselves are required to provide their own teaching syllabuses and materials, because the State refuses to give them any financial assistance.

Whilst this may suggest that home schooling is a costly business, especially for working class folk, teaching materials are not really that expensive. There are a wide range of preparatory textbooks which can be ordered from libraries or obtained from places like W. H. Smith, Early Learning Centre and John Menzies. Alternatively, secondhand bookshops can often enable you to pick up a variety of useful encyclopaedias and other basic study aids for very little cost.

If several 'alternatives' in one area wish to organise a teaching environment for their children, books, stationary and other resources can even be shared. The proposed environment can simply be a room in an 'alternative' house-hold, one which has been set aside for a blackboard, a small collection of educational literature and some painting, drawing and modelling materials

In America, there are well over one million home-educators and, according to Dr. Roland Meighan, a senior lecturer at Birmingham University, "research has shown that many of the children are two years ahead of those educated in schools." He also asserts that State education alienates children from the learning process, whilst home-schooling makes them far more self-motivated. Parents are able to build up interesting programmes for their children using a wide range of sources, from selective school broadcasts on television to local museums and libraries. The choice extends to formal lessons, computer programmes, reading, playing, music, cooking, craftwork, sports and outdoor activities.

Some parents may be concerned that home-schooling will result in their children being excluded from universities and colleges when they approach the official school-leaving age, due to the fact that it does not gear them towards tests and examinations. However, according to a university undergraduates admissions director: "Our university welcomes application forms from home-schooled students. We believe students educated primarily at home possess the passion for knowledge, the independence, and self-reliance that enables them to excel in our intellectually challenging programmes of study." So schools will undoubtedly fade into the background as the whole community becomes a network of learning centres with people themselves taking full control of their family's education.

One argument used by the liberal opponents of home-schooling is that children raised in such an environment will somehow grow up 'sheltered' or 'socially naive'. However, this accusation can easily be refuted by pointing out that home-schooling essentially protects the innocence of childhood from the ravages of the mass society in which we find ourselves. Indeed, why shouldn't parents seek to defend their offspring from the trappings of liberal-capitalism?

Another favourite contention put forward by those who favour mass educational methods relates to the issue of socialisation. But whereas children do need to socialise with other children, this is not the reason why they attend schools anyway; schools should be there to educate children, not force them to adhere to a specific pattern of behaviour. Parents who home-school their children already ensure that their youngsters come into contact with other people through clubs, societies and associations. Home-schooling enables children to socialise within their own communities, rather than be subjected to the forced tyranny of the adolescent peer group.

BETTER SOCIAL SKILLS?

According to the March 1996 issue of Child Education magazine (p.68): "Several studies of home educated children have found that they have better social skills and are better socially adjusted than children of the same age who are educated at school. Home educated children tend to have more experience of relating to people who are both older and younger than themselves. In addition, they have had the particular benefit of learning through conversation and close personal contact. How often are children in a class of thirty or more listened to individually, talked to personally and praised and encouraged?" High praise indeed from a journal produced by the educational establishment!

If 'alternative' parents are able to introduce their children to like-minded families in the same area it is possible to prevent 'outsiders' from having any influence upon their lives whatsoever. Indeed, by herding thirty or forty children of the same age group together in one room, schools inevitably create an artificial environment. This process hardly prepares young people for the harsh realities of life outside.

In addition, the school is designed to turn youngsters into a ready-made workforce and far from acquainting them with their historical and cultural traditions, adopts a production-line approach in order to prepare them for the boring servility of the factory floor or the computer terminal.

Returning to J. Mark Halstead, parents who home school their children "feel that there is plenty of time to get to grips with the grim realities of boring, repetitive jobs. Indeed, they may choose home education because they do not want their children to accept such limitations. They may hope instead to foster resourcefulness and individuality which will prepare them for more adventurous, interesting lives."

Home-schooling does not preclude students from a university place

Finally, many of us are already involved in such initiatives and, in the future, we hope to build an alternative home-education network in the same way that Education Otherwise has managed to do up to now. The growing distrust parents have towards the incompetence of State schooling is a crack in the Enemy's amour that is waiting to be exploited. Conscientious parents instinctively know that something is wrong with the System and are looking for a way out of it. Such people need our example and incentive, and there is no reason why Alternative Green or Beyond Left-Right [or the BNP - Ed] cannot become one of the leading proponents of home education in England, especially as groups like Education Otherwise do not advocate a specific form of ideological and moral guidance.

We must establish Practical Learning Centres, where tools and equipment will be available for those who wish to borrow them; we must install Alternative Libraries where children can gain access to alternative books, tapes, films and exhibitions; we must create Community Centres to involve local people in sports activities, music, drama and social events; and we must set up Family Advice Groups, where parents and children can meet up to discuss useful teaching methods and, if necessary, air potential problems or difficulties.

In the meantime, if you are a parent who is unprepared to see your child force-fed a daily diet of 'political correctness' and 'positive discrimination', then you should seriously consider the educational alternatives which are gradually becoming available. We must never lose sight of the fact that our alternative future lies in its youth.

Selective Reporting on Racist Murders

» BNP member Ralph Ellis sent the following letter to all national newspapers last month. Not one published it

» Sir

Once again your paper highlights the alleged racist murder of a black citizen, Anthony Walker. However, your newspaper has at the same time deliberately ignored the racist murder of at least half a dozen white people within the last year or so.

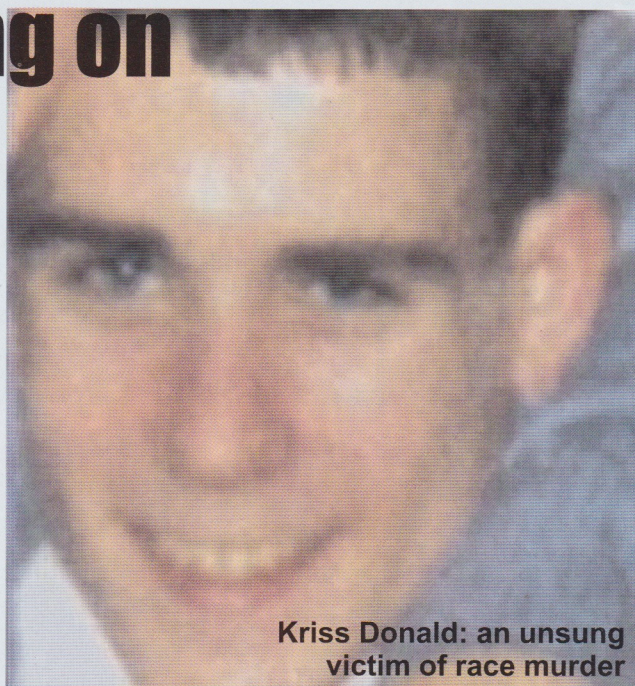

Did your paper highlight the racist killing of Richard Whelan in North London last week?

Did your editor worry unduly about David Henkel who was racially abused and killed last week in Chatham, Kent?

Does it worry your staff that Danny O'Connor was cornered by Dulu Miah and his gang, branded as being 'white trash' and murdered? The News of the World sought to 'justify' this racist murder because Danny had been wearing an England football shirt - is that your considered excuse too?

Then there is the indescribable racist murder of Kriss Donald in Glasgow. Kriss was taken on a 200 mile journey of death in the back of a car, while being kicked, stabbed and set on fire. Even worse, the word on the streets is that Kriss had his eyes plucked out while he was still alive. <http://news.scotsman.com/topics.cfm?tid=137&id=1439392004>

Is there shock and horror on the front pages at this terrible litany of racist crimes against whites? No - instead there is a news blackout, if you excuse the use of the term. The considered media response is that only whites are responsible for such crimes, only whites are racist, and only whites need to feel institutionally ashamed.

Even mass-murdering bombers can be excused their crimes because it is all 'our fault', because of events in the wider world. Even the BBC's Hardtalk has taken this excuse as a valid point, as if mass-murder is now a valid political tool within Britain. Muslims, apparently, are not responsible for their actions. As Cherie Blair once said about suicide bombings - "what do we expect when these people have no hope?" Poor darlings, plant another bomb if it makes you feel better....

When will the West understand that immigrants in general and Islam in particular have an excuse for every crime and atrocity they commit? When will our government face reality and deal effectively with the ethnic and religious minorities who blight our communities?

Sincerely
Ralph Ellis

EAST ENDED

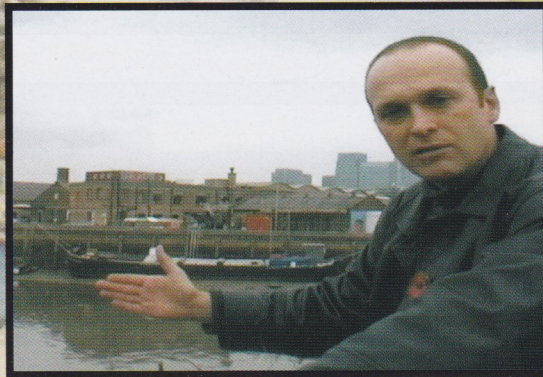

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE EAST END

E1

STRIKE
RIGHTS FOR WHITE

"The best produced film
In the history of British Nationalism"

Produced and directed by BNPTv's Rod Gordon and starring BNP election Officer Eddy Butler, East Ended takes the viewer on a tour of London's East End. It charts the decline and fall of the East End as immigration eventually made the native people and their distinct culture a matter for the history books.

This DVD is available from Excalibur at £13.99 (inc p&p), see opposite page for details

General Fund Appeal - Help Us Keep Up The Pressure

Unlike the Lib-Lab-Con men we aren't funded by big business, trade union leaders or by single large donors simply trying to influence Government policy. Instead we rely on the hard working decent British people who make up the BNP to keep our well oiled machine rolling.

After the great success of this year's Red White and Blue all eyes are now fixed firmly on the task ahead - the council elections of 2006. But before we reach that point we have many hurdles to cross, including the Free Speech trial of Nick Griffin and Mark Collett.

Over the past months we have mounted a huge anti-Islamic terror campaign with over 600,000 leaflets going out, as well as posters and business cards bearing our new slogan - Freedom and Security NOT Diversity and Danger.

The British National Party are the only party who are speaking out against the terrorists and the liberal traitors who have both brought them into our midst - and allowed them to organise themselves. Help us keep up the pressure.

Yes! I want to help the British National Party keep up it's campaign against Islamic terrorism and Labour Government. Please find enclosed my cheque payable to 'British National Party' or 'British Heritage'.
